In 8th edition 40k, certain missions require you to use tactical objectives. In the main rulebook there is a list of these objectives, and you can select them randomly by rolling dice and then consulting the table.

Tactical Objectives made 40K missions dynamic and exciting. What would happen if we took it a step further? As narrative event organizer, my primary job is to manage player fun. In our narrative games we act as game master with a focus on keeping the players having a good time. A big factor is player fun is what they focus on. There are times when a player loses enough of their force that the major mission objectives are out of reach for them. That is when as event organizer I need to give them something new to focus on. Score 2 more point if he is safely off the board or in your control at the end of the game. The game master at the beginning of the turn drops the crashed Aquila Lander 12 inches from his un-engaged tactical squad. The game master tells the table the lander has crashed and hands the Dark Angels the object card. We love crunchy bits in our games. The above is an example of how to use scatter terrain as an objective. Another idea might be to use proxy force. We have a couple of missions ready to go for each prop. That way we can be flexible on how we use them. We also play test the missions to see how far away we should locate the prop, what mechanic works best and where we can vary the mission for the best effect. There are lots of options, all with the focus on flexibility and engaging players who may have lost sight of the fun in a game. The key to success is keeping it small and simple. Simple in that the object and any mechanics need to fit in sentences. Complicated ideas are better suited for big missions where you can spend time explaining before the game and answer player questions. Try to avoid just giving the player fresh units and instead, make them use the units they have left for something new. How do you think we keep 40K from becoming a card game?

These cards hold the 36 Tactical Objectives from the Warhammer 40, book. This pack makes it easy to randomly generate objectives and keep track of those already secured in games of Warhammer 40,

This all started with a simple question: So again, I set out to answer the question: There are lots of things going on from basic rules, unit rules, army rules, warlord traits, relics, stratagems, psychic powers, to well, you get the idea. There are lots of moving parts and frankly, Tactical Objectives just sorta get in the way. They add complexity to an already complex system. And what is perhaps the best reason NOT to use them is that they are optional. Tactical Objectives are typically relegated to Maelstrom of War missions only. But there are some interesting things in there about them. Did you know you know that most Maelstrom of War missions have 6 objectives placed on the board? Did you know that most of the Maelstrom of War Missions have you draw multiple cards that both players can attempt to score? Or that the active player can discard a Tactical Objective at the end of their turn and draw a new one? Because I never really bothered to look at those options in 8th. As streamlined as 8th is, I still forget to do things sometimes. But it really boils down to the fact that I still find them more of a chore than fun and this is supposed to be a game that people play for entertainment. Even with all the ways to cycle through the decks or objectives this is still a fear many players have. However the effect of the Tactical Objectives is net-negative for the game experience which is another reason people pass. Maybe you want a challenge so you go for it. Not even getting a chance to score the objectives, however small, is a major problem people have with the Tactical Objectives. They can change every turn and can totally throw off your entire game plan. Run from point to point, objective to objective, and HOPE you score it. Your army can end up running around in circles and playing itself. Tactical Objectives – For the Brave and the Bold? At the end of the day, 40k is still a game and folks should play how they want. If you enjoy Tactical Objectives, more power to you! They are too heavily weighted towards Luck and are an optional set of missions that are easy to ignore. Are there solutions and ways to make the Tactical Objectives actually useful? Which also means the Maelstrom of War missions would have to be looked at as well. Better luck next time. How do you feel about Tactical Objectives. Let us know in the comments below!
