As a child during World War II he was evacuated to the countryside but was present during the bombings on London in and This early exposure to the violence and terror of war probably shaped themes in his work, while his experience of the evacuation gave him an awareness of social alienation which would characterise his writing. He later explained that this performance was the first time he had been presented with traumatic experiences comparable to his own in a way he could apprehend and give meaning to. During his time in the army he discovered the naked violence hidden behind normal social behaviour, and decided to start writing. Saved delves into the lives of a selection of South London working class youths suppressed "as Bond would see it" by a brutal economic system and unable to give their lives meaning, who drift eventually into barbarous mutual violence. Among them, one character, Len, persistently and successfully tries to maintain links between people violently tearing each other to pieces. The play was directed by William Gaskill, then artistic director of the Royal Court. Saved included a scene featuring the stoning to death of a baby in its pram. The Lord Chamberlain sought to censor it, but Bond refused to alter a word, claiming that removing this pivotal scene would alter the meaning of the play. Formation of a theatre club normally allowed plays that had been banned for their language or subject matter to be performed under "club" conditions such as that at the Comedy Theatre, however the English Stage Society were prosecuted. An active campaign sought to overturn the prosecution, with a passionate defence presented by Laurence Olivier, then Artistic Director of the National Theatre. The court found the English Stage Society guilty and they were given a conditional discharge. This portrays a lesbian relationship between Queen Victoria and Florence Nightingale, the royal Princes as Siamese twins, Disraeli and Prince Albert plotting a coup and the whole dramatis personae damned to a cannibalistic Heaven after falling off Beachy Head. The Royal Court produced the play despite the imposition of a total ban and within a year the law was finally repealed. The play follows the decay of an aging tyrannical king. Betrayed by his two cynical daughters; hounded as a political risk following military defeat; pursued by the ghost of a man whose life he has destroyed and whose death he has caused; imprisoned and tortured until enucleated; after a life of violence he finally finds wisdom and peace in a radical opposition to power. The end of the play shows him as a forced labourer in a camp setting an example for future rebellion by sabotaging the wall he once built, which subsequent regimes keep perpetuating. Nurtured by his experience as a child evacuee to the seaside, the play is rightly subtitled "a comedy" and was intended as optimistic after the gloomy mood of his previous plays. Bond then produced two pieces exploring the place of the artist in society. Bingo portrayed the retired Shakespeare as an exploitative landlord, an impotent yet compassionate witness of social violence, who eventually commits suicide, repeatedly asking himself "Was anything done? The Fool reinterprets the life of the rural 19th century poet John Clare. It involves Clare in the Littleport Riots of, and then makes his own poetry the depository of the spirit of this rural rebellion against the growth of modern industrial capitalism. The failure of this historical class war eventually drives him to a madhouse. From the s to the mids: His plays were requested by institutional and community theatres, for premieres and revivals, and he was commissioned to write plays both by renowned institutions and fringe activist companies. We Come to the River. In the pair collaborated again, less successfully on another opera, The English Cat. Beginning with Bingo in, the RSC revived and toured his plays regularly until the early s, and Bond, though often disagreeing with the aesthetic choices of its productions [23] or protesting at not being consulted sufficiently, recognized the genuine support the company gave to his work. In, Bond accepted an honorary doctorate in letters by Yale University although, thirty years previously, he had not been allowed to sit for his eleven-plus examination and he began to take up students workshops in Newcastle, Durham and Birmingham, for which he wrote several plays. The most accomplished among them was The Worlds, written for the Newcastle University Theatre Society, based on the recent events in the UK, both the Northern Ireland conflict and the social crisis of the winter of Discontent. His early plays were directly influenced by the coming to power of the Conservative Party led by Margaret Thatcher and the profound social changes they were bringing about. Restoration, as a half-musical parody of Restoration comedies, deals with working class support for the Tories by showing a servant accepting his conviction and eventual execution for a murder committed by his cynical and silly master. Summer deals with the moral ambiguities of capitalism through the conflict of two women in socialist Yugoslavia. One is the daughter of former landlords, whose compassionate nature does not prevent them from being exploiters and collaborationists during the German occupation. The other, the daughter of servants, rejects the values of the former, whom she once saved from a firing squad. Derek, written for a youth festival, alludes directly to the Falklands war and shows an idiotic aristocrat stealing the brain of a gifted worker and sending him to die in a war in a country that "sounds like the name of a disease". Controversial directing attempts and quarrels with the institutions[edit] During the late s, Bond felt he needed practical contact with the stage to experiment with his ideas on drama and improve his writing. After staging Lear in German at the Burgtheater, in Vienna in , Bond directed his last four plays in London between and . The theatres and their actors accused him of being authoritarian and abstract in his direction [23] and unrealistic in his production requirements, and Bond complained undiplomatically about their lack of artistic engagement [31] [32] and had crude rows both with some reluctant actors and theatre managers. With his notoriously uncompromising attitude, Bond gained the reputation of a "difficult author", which contributed to keeping him away from the major English stages. During the mids, Peter Hall at the National Theatre repeatedly refused to allow him to direct his new play Human Cannon, written for Yvonne Bryceland and the wide stage of the Olivier. He only agreed to return to the RSC in when he directed In the Company of Men, but considered this production a failure. He nevertheless regularly accepted revivals and sometimes got involved in these productions, although remaining generally unsatisfied, [38] and he directed workshops for RSC actors with Cicely Berry. These conflicts are still highly controversial, and Bond and those with whom he has clashed continue to settle scores in letters, books and interviews. Motivated by the threats of the last years of the Cold War and the political activism it provoked in Britain and Europe, Bond had planned to write about nuclear war since the early s. He found a means to do so after testing a storyline with Sicilian students in Palermo. According to Bond, each student who improvised as the soldier refused to kill a foreign child and paradoxically returned home to kill their own sibling instead. Between and he wrote three plays to meet various requests, which he united as The War Plays. The first, Red Black and Ignorant written for a Festival dedicated to George Orwell, is a short agit-prop play in which a child, aborted and burnt to death in the nuclear global bombings, comes from the future to accuse the society of the audience of his murder. It shows a community of survivors living on an infinite supply of canned food running berserk when they feel threatened by a stranger and destroying all they have as in a reduced nuclear war. The third, Great Peace written for the RSC re-enacts the Palermo improvisation in a city barely surviving in the aftermath of nuclear bombardment. The play then follows her twenty years later, in the sterile global wilderness that nuclear war has made of the world, where she rebuilds her humanity bit by bit by meeting other survivors. His next play, Jackets, again uses the Palermo improvisation and sets up a confrontation between two young men manipulated by military conspiracies, first in medieval Japan, then in contemporary urban riots. In the Company of Men shows a desperate fight by the adoptive son of an armaments factory manager to be who he is in a cynical, intrigue-ridden neo-liberal business world that Bond considers the mirror of our post-modern times. In Tuesday, a young deserter tries to tell the truth about the war but is destroyed by society. More innovative in structure, Coffee exposes the cultural roots of violence. It contrasts an initial, imaginary section resembling a gloomy fairy tale, in which a mother kills her child because she can no longer feed her, with a second, realistic part reproducing the historical Babi Yar massacre, where the same characters are among the victims. As in the Palermo improvisation, a soldier realises he cannot shoot the victims any more, and eventually decides instead to shoot his officer and escape with the girl. Have I None, Chair and The Under Room show the monotonous life of the cities, where social relationships and memory have been abolished, consumption and possession standardized, and where people are harassed by the resistance of their imagination and panicked by strangers. One was the Birmingham -based theatre-in-education company Big Brum, of which he remains an associate artist. From to he wrote seven very different plays dedicated to young audiences for this company: Big Brum appears to be the only professional company in England for more than two decades that Bond is openly writing for and allowing to premiere his plays. In France, he has held several conferences with participants drawn from a wide audience [53] and has directed many workshops in Paris and elsewhere. He has been invited to take part in conferences and workshops all over Europe and America. In Germany, interest in his plays has remained high since the seventies. During the autumn of The Cock Tavern Theatre in London produced six of his plays simultaneously one chosen from each decade , including a new one, provisionally entitled There Will Be More, commissioned for this occasion and performed although unfinished. Both of these plays were filmed and made available online. Nine volumes of his Collected Plays, including the prefaces, are available from the UK publisher Methuen. In he published The Hidden Plot , a collection of writings on theatre and the meaning of drama. He has published two volumes from his notebooks and four volumes of letters. His Collected Poems was published in Tony Richardson and the aboriginal drama Walkabout , dir. Nicolas Roeg ; as well as contributing dialogue to Blowup , dir. Michelangelo Antonioni and Nicholas and Alexandra , dir. Eriprando Visconti, Laughter in the Dark, from V. Tony Richardson, Walkabout, from J. Nicolas Roeg, Nicholas and Alexandra, dir: Melville , , unperformed Ithaca, from Homer , â€”99, unperformed.
