That typically amounts to just 20 hours per employee per year. The management of pro bono projects should be fundamentally the same as that for paid clients, including regular invoicing. Areas to grow Pro bono work offers an opportunity to explore a heretoforeunexplored sector of your profession. Firms with expertise in highend residential can branch out into daycare facilities or build an emergency shelter at a local park. Outside of the constraints of traditional practice, there can be both the opportunity for greater creative freedom and new project types. Having an organizational strategy to manage the load of pro bono projects will increase the likelihood of good outcomes and limit budget overruns. Liability Liability exposure is primarily the same for pro bono work as for paid work. There are contractual provisions that can help you manage the limits of your exposure that are appropriate for pro bono clients. We recommend that you consult your legal council to determine the best agreement for you and your client. You should discuss the approach you choose with your attorney. Here are three of the most common ways to structure pro bono teams in design offices. Dedicated team Assemble dedicated staff to pro bono projects. Rotating team You can allow all staff to participate in pro bono projects on a rotating basis. In-house design competitions Pro bono projects can be a great method for generating excitement among the staff. Museum staff, former clients and local politicians sat on the jury, creating an additional opportunity for networking and community outreach. It requires continuous frank and direct communication between designer and client. Greater clarity at this stage will diminish the risk of future misunderstanding. Fill out the questionnaire requesting basic information. By , firms participating in the program helped nearly one thousand nonprofits seeking pro bono design services. Follow these easy steps to register your firm online, pledge your percentage, and gain access to a pool of nonprofit projects. Inquiries expire after one month when no response is received. Send an email to info TheOnePlus. Interdisciplinary teams are welcomed and encouraged. There are many types of projects for which nonprofits may request pro bono services. It represents some of the most common projects that design firms can help nonprofit organizations to accomplish. Lighting controls, daylighting, improving mechanical systems and other green technologies can save clients money in the long term and lower their environmental impact. Landscape projects include parks, monuments, streetscapes and public outdoor spaces, transportation, gardens, security design, institutional and academic campuses, and more. Establishing a relationship with an institutional client can be valuable considering that one third of all architectural projects belong to institutional organizations. To add to that, Sid Scott of Scott Edwards Architects observes that pro bono projects can lead to paid work in the future. A good way to promote your project is to promote your client. It can help build their capacity and yours. To that end, pro bono work should be highlighted to your paying clients as well. Click on a project to see the description and details. We conduct case studies on a regular basis to distill best practices and have a number of other project resources to further assist designers committed to social change. Firm Surveys may be found online at issuu. The Public Dialog The Public Dialog is a blog by Public Architecture that seeks to advance our understanding of design thinking as tool for social change. How can designers effectively work for underserved communities? What is the impact of the built environment on our lives? What is the role and value of pro bono service for the design profession?
