Just before he barricaded himself and the girls inside, Roberts let the boys go. Aaron Jr went outside, then panicked because his little brother Joel was still inside. Joel, then seven, was the last boy out. Seven minutes after the teacher raised the alarm, state troopers arrived. It is believed Roberts planned to sexually molest the girls during a lengthy siege. He told them, survivors said, that he was angry at God because his baby daughter had died despite his prayers. He also said he had molested two young female relatives when a teen, a claim that was never proven. When the troopers came, he fired at each of the 10 girls, then shot himself dead. The community convulsed in shock and grief. The boys had a lucky escape, so everyone said. But they themselves were traumatized. It bothered him and other boys that they had not done something. Some of them are still struggling with that, 10 years on. Within days, the community knocked down the school house. In Blacksburg, Virginia, a disturbed student killed 32 students and members of staff. Many in Nickel Mines were distressed all over again. Aaron Jr went through a growth spurt that winter, growing from 5ft 1in to 5ft 6in, but his weight dropped from 110lb to 90lb. The boy would come home early from school, having panic attacks. Like most of the survivors and bereaved, he and his brother accepted counselling from outside professional therapists. But Aaron Jr was depressed. In the summer of 1955, he ended up in a secure hospital ward, close to death from starvation. He spent many painful months recovering, the family said. Aaron Jr said that around that time, three state troopers came to visit him. They sat outside on the porch, he said, and told him what happened at the school was not his fault. If he had tried to intervene, they said, the outcome would probably have been a lot worse. At one point I had had thoughts of suicide. He works in the construction industry. Ten years ago, she was shot multiple times in the shoulder and hand. Her younger sister Emma, then nine, was the only girl who managed to escape the school room before the shooting started, quietly walking out while Roberts struggled with a faulty window shade. Their older sister, Marian, was killed. Barbara, known as Barbie, later said that in the petrifying minutes that Roberts stood over the girls, holding a gun and talking about taking revenge on God, Marian said: At the time, Marian was widely held to have displayed superhuman courage, in an attempt to protect the younger girls. Now, the truth remains a mystery.

Most memorable, however is the cloud that has darkened Chicago politics for longer than I can remember. Having moved to different parts of the City, I was exposed to different political factions and influences. Throughout my experience clout always counted, and was exercised daily. I still remember as a new resident of Lincolnwood being quickly called upon by the local Democratic Precinct Captain. He wanted to know if I was a registered Democrat, and I told him that I was not. The Precinct Captain told me that it would be of substantial benefit if I registered as a Democrat, because he had the muscle to impact my Property Tax, since he was the Tax Assessor. What would you have done? Living on the South Side of Chicago the prevailing wind was from either the northwest or the southeast. When it came from the northwest the stench of the Union Stock Yards prevailed, and when it was from the southeast the aroma of the huge City dump on South Doty Avenue dominated. As a citizen of Chicago I learned just what sensory adaptation meant. People in the City accepted the stench of both the air and their political leadership as a way of life or survival. Neither was pleasant, but no one ever felt they could do anything about it, so sadly no one ever put up a fight to correct either problem. The dominance of the all powerful Democratic Machine in Chicago goes back decades. It has deep roots with the early immigrant Irish, but it consists of several ethnic groups such as the Polish, Germans, African Americans, Hispanics, Italians, Slavic, and Jewish in various ethnic enclaves around the City. The Machine has long thrived with very close ties to organized labor unions. There are two very good books about the earlier days of political influence in Chicago. While the Daley Machine has ruled for decades they are only part of the story. I remember clearly the day Mayor Richard J. Daley died in the office of his doctor, and the city came to a total and stunning stop. Some citizens thought that was the end of life in Chicago without their beloved Mayor Daley. Today one of his sons rules with a strong, behind the scenes velvet hammer. Did you know that he never completed his formal studies in Theology? After reading the book, I asked myself why no law enforcement official has ever taken any legal action against the Reverend Jackson. Political clout and the fear of arousing racial tensions thrive in Chicago. Politicians have successfully been playing one ethnic group against another for years. I have never understood why the African American community has so strongly supported the Chicago Political Machine, because they have gotten little or nothing for their loyalty. One point of view indicates that the Machine permits the Black constituency in on a cut of the action, and that keeps them under their thumb. The Blagojevich scandal will not go away quickly. There is the familiar Chicago stench swarming around this situation, and it has the potential to take down a lot of high ranking individuals. I see no way for him to not be negatively influenced by this Blagojevich scandal. When he takes the Presidential Oath of Office, President Obama will not receive the normal period of grace that newly elected Presidents are granted. Experience has taught me to be very suspicious when so many questionable characters converge around one individual. Everyone on this list is from or deeply associated with the Chicago political machine, which I call the Chicago Clout Factory. Remember Illinois is a state that convicted three Governors, and they were sentenced to prison. Our President-Elect has already made a huge public relations blunder in not getting out in front of the Blagojevich scandal. He should have addressed it immediately, firmly, and with total transparency. Instead Obama has stalled for time to consider his options. Why has Rham Emanuel been hiding? Now it has been disclosed that Emanuel did have numerous contacts with the Governor on the Senate seat succession, but that should have been stated immediately not days later. This scandal stinks to high heaven with deepening roots, and the man who promised CHANGE is delivering less than clear answers. Remember, Chicago politicians have a long history of eating their young. The aroma of Chicago politics lingers, and it will not clear until all the interwoven facts are exposed.

So what happens if your application has been denied for a Michigan medical marijuana business license? LARA has provided some guidance on this topic in Emergency Rule 46, which governs the appeal process. First, the regulations require an applicant to request a public investigative hearing within 21 days of service of the notice. This requires the applicants to act quickly, as their window of opportunity is only 3 weeks from the date the rejection letter is mailed. Prior to the public investigative hearing, an applicant should prepare all the evidence and testimony they need to show their eligibility and suitability for licensure. The agency or ALJ might send out subpoenas requesting additional documentation from you to support their case, which you would have to provide them with prior to the hearing. Much like a civil court trial, the applicant will have the opportunity to present their argument, question witnesses, cross-examine opposing witnesses, provide supporting exhibits, and answer questions from the ALJ. The ALJ makes its recommendations to the Licensing Board, which then reconsiders its decision in light of the facts and recommendations made by the ALJ and has final say over whether the decision to deny the application was proper. In this way, the Licensing Board actually acts as its own appeals board. It is important to note that the applicant needs to establish, by clear and convincing evidence, that it is eligible and suitable for licensure. This is a very high threshold for applicants, and should not be taken lightly. This appeal process is rigorous and will require a vast amount of time and work in order to prepare a winning strategy for your appeal. There will be a significant amount of time between when your application is denied by the Licensing Board and when you have the ability to go before an impartial decision maker in state court. This was likely by design. There is one simple alternative to this process—reapply. There is nothing stopping you from reapplying using the exact same application, though this would not be recommended. Depending on the issues that tripped up your original application, a few changes or small tweaks may be all that is needed to turn your denial into an approval. As an example, there has been applications denied for the failure to provide adequate explanations to LARA deficiency letter issues. In addition, it is possible that the application was denied because of background issues of one single partner. That partner could then be bought out and the other partners reapply without the issues related to their previous partner that weighed down their previous application. In sum, if you have recently been denied in the Part 1 application process, we recommend contacting a Michigan medical marijuana business attorney to discuss your options. It is possible that an appeal, though time consuming and expensive may be your best option. It is also possible that you would be better off simply reapplying with counsel familiar with the process and knowledgeable about how to fix the issues that caused your original application to be denied.
