Early history and settlement[edit] The island Alameda occupies what was originally a peninsula connected to Oakland. Much of it was low-lying and marshy, but on higher ground than the peninsula and adjacent parts of what is now downtown Oakland were home to one of the largest coastal oak forests in the world. The area was therefore called Encinal, Spanish for "forest of evergreen oak". The grant was later confirmed by the new Republic of Mexico upon its independence from Spain. The first post office opened in Bowman, an early settler. The transcontinental terminus was switched to the Oakland Mole two months later, on November 8, The borders of Alameda were made coextensive with the island in , incorporating Woodstock into Alameda. Often compared to Coney Island , the park was a major attraction in the s and s. The original owners of the facility, the Strehlow family, partnered with a local confectioner to create tastes unique to Neptune Beach. Both the American snow cone [17] and the popsicle [18] were first sold at Neptune Beach. The Cottage Baths were available for rent. The park closed down in because of the Great Depression , the completion of the San Francisco–Oakland Bay Bridge , people circumventing paying the admission price, and the rise of car culture. Once the Bay Bridge was complete, the rail lines, which ran right past the entrance to Neptune Beach on the way to the Alameda Mole and the Ferry, lost riders in droves. People began using their cars to escape the city and the immediate suburbs like Alameda and traveling further afield in California. Alameda lost its resort status as more distant locations became more attractive to cash-rich San Francisco tourists. Youngsters in town became aware of ways to avoid paying the dime for admission to the park. Strong swimmers or even waders could sneak in on the bay side just by swimming around the fence. Some of the resort homes and buildings from the Neptune beach era still exist in present-day Alameda. Neptune Court, just a block away on the corner of Central Ave. A short walk near Crab Cove will reveal many more historic gems. A grass roots effort to create swimming pools at two high schools and two city parks would continue into the early s. Transportation[edit] Map of East Bay area in , showing Alameda, Oakland, and Berkeley When the railroad came to town in the s Park Street developed into the major thoroughfare of the city and the location of the main Alameda train station, residents of Old Alameda pulled up stakes and moved across town to the new downtown. As a result, they designated their mutual property line as Park Street. The need for expanded shipping facilities and flow through the estuary led to the dredging of a canal through the marshland between Oakland and Alameda. The area of Alameda called Bay Farm Island is no longer an island, but is attached by fill to Oakland. In his youth, author Jack London was known to take part in oyster pirating in the highly productive oyster beds near Bay Farm Island, today long gone. The Alameda Works Shipyard was one of the largest and best equipped shipyards in the country. Currently, the Port of Oakland across the estuary serves as one of the largest ports on the West Coast, using the shipping technologies originally experimented with in Alameda. The trains ran to both the Oakland Mole and the Alameda Mole. In fact, one line which ran between the two moles was dubbed the "Horseshoe Line" for the shape of the route on a map. Soon after the completion of the Bay Bridge, Alameda trains ran directly to San Francisco on the lower deck of the bridge, the ferries having been rendered unnecessary. In the s Pan American Airways established a seaplane port along the fill that led to the Alameda Mole. This was the original home base for the famous China Clipper flying boat. In , the University of California established the San Francisco Airdrome located near the current Webster Street tube as a public airport. The Bay Airdrome had its gala christening party in This major Naval facility included a large airfield, as well as docks for several aircraft carriers. It closed in Eleven people, including pilot Lieutenant Robert Lee Ward died in the crash and fire. Alameda Point and Southshore are built on bay fill. Not all of Alameda Island is part of the City of Alameda. Although nearly all of the island is in Alameda city limits, a small portion of a dump site west of the former runways at Alameda
