A lot of people transcribed the song wrongly, they thought it was a straight F chord. The song was written in D flat. The suspended gives it a slightly different feel. Trevor Horn and the Digital Revolution, Timothy Warner said that the "relatively quiet introduction" helping the listener detect a high amount of "tape hiss" generated through the use of analogue multi-track tape recorders, as well as the timbre of the synthesized instruments, give an indication of the technical process and time of producing the song. Problems playing this file? The song was put in more than three months of production. We need to do this and we need to do that. It was all about how dry and how loud they should be in the mix without the whole thing sounding ridiculous. As it turned out, that record still had the loudest bass drum ever for its time. Gary Langan and Trevor Horn also tried using a bullhorn, but they found it too harsh. The album version plays for 4 minutes and 13 seconds, about 48 seconds longer than the single version, as it fades into a piano and synth coda, which ends with a brief sampling of the female vocals. In Australia, "Video Killed the Radio Star" reached number one, where it was the best-selling record for 27 years. Originally, the song became a Billboard Top Single Pick on 3 November, whom the publication found the chorus catchy and also highlighted the orchestral instruments supporting the backing singers. They were joined by Debi Doss and Linda Jardim now Linda Allan, who performed the background singing on the original recording. Paul Robinson, who played drums on the original, also appeared. Both Horn and Downes have performed the song live in other acts, including Yes which Downes and Horn joined for the Drama album and tour in, Downes in the "revival of Asia with John Wetton singing lead and again in with Billy Sherwood singing lead, and Horn in his band The Producers, also in. The tube falls over in the video, although Mulcahy claims it was not intended to be shown in the final edit. A black-and-white shot of Trevor Horn singing into a radio-era microphone is superimposed over the girl by the radio. The radio blows up by the time of the first chorus, and then in the second verse, she is seen transported into the future, where she meets Horn and a silver-jumpsuited female in a clear plastic tube. Shots of Horn and Geoff Downes are shown during the remainder of the video.

Chapter 2 : Star (TV series) - Wikipedia

The third Television album never really got to me in the way that the first two did, OR SO being the exception. I feel the writing is so-so and is the only song that really, really sticks in my head, like GLORY or I SEE NO EVIL.
