

Chapter 1 : What is an analytical commentary

To write an analytical essay, first write an introduction that gives your reader background information and introduces your thesis. Then, write body paragraphs in support of your thesis that include a topic sentence, an analysis of some part of the text, and evidence from the text that supports your analysis.

Ah, the analytical commentary. It probably makes up a bunch of your SACs. But what actually is it, and how do you actually write it? And I think that confuses a lot of students. What better place for introductory information like this than the introduction? And this is important, because contextual information can definitely, absolutely affect language choices. Social purpose and register basically the formality of the text are also needed. You may even like to make a mental list of features to look for: I find that articles like this tend to be most useful with actual examples. Judging by locations named in the text, the transaction appeared to occur in Victoria, Australia; however, this is not specified. The tone between interlocutors is consistently friendly and engaging, perhaps due to the professional nature of the conversation C is providing customer service to A and, therefore, must remain civil. For both C and A, the primary function is to make a transaction books exchanged for financial reimbursement. However, there simultaneously exist a number of social purposes; for example, each participant appears to encourage intimacy, and both go some way to building social rapport. Overall, both C and A adopt an informal register; this is reflected by phonological, lexical and discourse features throughout the text. You can find my full analytical commentary example here. Some things to note: Like, I know that others prefer to have a paragraph on function, then on register, then on social purpose and so on. Others still prefer to run through the text chronologically a paragraph on the first part of the next, then a paragraph on the middle part, then a paragraph on the final section. Which way is best? But yep, the way I do it is pretty much this: Subsystem 2 Paragraph 4: Subsystem 3 Do you need a conclusion? After all, what would you say? In terms of how to actually structure one of these funky body paragraphs, I usually go something along the lines of: What do I mean by that? The fundamental difference is that descriptivists simply describe how language is used. Prescriptivists, on the other hand, are sort of like self-anointed arbiters of language use usage? If you have any questions, feel free to ask them either here or here! And if you want feedback on an analytical commentary or essay, post it here! Get around this list!

By Richard Loth Contact Biography The financial media are major purveyors of information on the mutual fund industry as a whole, as well as on individual funds. The quality of this information varies greatly. Oftentimes, this content is fairly shallow and aimed at the short term, such as covering which particular fund or fund category is "flying high. So, put aside the personal finance magazines and do not waste any more time listening to the talking heads on CNBC. Familiarity with and the knowledgeable use of independent fund investment research are your keys to finding investment quality in a mutual fund. The fund reports provided by Morningstar and Value Line are outstanding examples of this type of material. They are essential evaluative tools for fund investors. Favorable analytics is not a measure that can be quantified; it involves analyst opinions and corporate governance issues. Positive analytical commentary in a Morningstar fund report is an important indicator of mutual fund investment quality. There are three unique analytical mutual fund perspectives that can be found in mutual fund reports: The Value Line reports also contain useful observations, which differ in that they more descriptive in nature than analytical. Evaluation of governance issues. As a result of the serious mutual fund scandals beginning in , mutual fund reports are including evaluations of mutual fund company governance issues. The ultimate goal of this commentary is to help investors choose funds that are sponsored by fund companies with good corporate governance practices. From this universe of funds, approximately 85 stock, 15 hybrid , and 50 bond funds are "picked" as the best of the bunch on a category-by-category basis. The Analyst Pick choices are based on these Morningstar criteria: Successful funds tend to be driven by consistent, repeatable strategies. Most strategies will hit rough patches from time to time; however, by staying focused on their winning formulas, these funds are likely to overcome any temporary setbacks. Experienced, successful management supported by a quality organization. Low expenses, which have greater predictive value than any other data point in the fund universe.
