Anybody's Nightmare is a single British television crime drama film, based on the true story of the imprisonment of Sheila Bowler, that broadcast on ITV on 7 October

Share via Email Sheila Bowler takes her tea very seriously. She favours a smoky, good-quality Earl Grey - piping hot, but not too strong - poured fresh from the pot into delicate china cups. For the next four years, Earl Grey was a luxury she learned to live without. In , however, her conviction was quashed by the court of appeal, and a retrial ordered. Acquitted by a jury seven months later, Bowler returned home to Sussex in search of decent tea and comfortable anonymity. The former, of course, was easy to find, the latter has proved a little more elusive. Suddenly, this dignified, stern woman whose coral pink lipstick exactly matches the colour of her sweater, finds herself the centre of attention all over again. It adds to the air of unreality that has always surrounded the experience. When I was in prison, I would wake up and think, well, it is true. It was beyond my comprehension that such a thing could happen. Prison was for other people - and its inmates were guilty of their crimes whatever they might say to the contrary. She used to drive past Holloway prison - where she spent part of her own sentence - without giving it a second thought. Now, though, she visits the friends she made inside as often as she can. Knowing how crucial support in the outside world can be, she is also a regular face at legal appeals. I know now that there are lots of people inside who are innocent, or who have been given the wrong kind of sentences. On that fateful May evening, she drove to pick up year-old Florence Jackson from her residential care home; Aunt Flo was to spend the weekend with Bowler in Rye. On their way back, however, the car had a puncture. Leaving Flo in the car, Bowler made her way to a nearby cottage to get help. When she returned to the car, Flo had gone. It never occurred to them that they might not be looking for a murderer at all - that Mrs Jackson, like other patients with dementia, had walked alone to her death. Sheila was deemed unfeeling just because, thanks to her upbringing, she was not terribly good at articulating her emotions. I think they just went all out to get me. When you play in a concert, afterwards you tend to wish you could do it over again so you could really enjoy it. I feel a little bit like that about the retrial. After I first left prison, I was very jittery. Banging doors sounded like prison vans; the sound of keys rattling reminded me of the officers. I found there was too much choice. I would come home with nothing. In genteel Rye, there are still those who believe that there is no smoke without fire and that Bowler has got away with murder. In , May was convicted of the murder of her aunt, year old Hilda Marchbank, after her body was found in her home in Royton, Lancashire. May, who met Sheila Bowler in prison, has always protested her innocence. Her appeal comes up later this month; Devlin and Bowler will both be in court. She has not forgotten them, and they are very grateful for that.
