Michigan's unique geographic feature within the United States is that it consists of two peninsulas. Four of the Great Lakes border Michigan, and a 5-mile channel called the Straits of Mackinac divides it into two separate landforms.

Deaths[ edit ] A total of 43 people died: Among the black deaths, 14 were shot by police officers; 9 were shot by National Guardsmen; 6 were shot by store owners or security guards; 2 were killed by asphyxiation from a building fire; 1 was killed after stepping on a downed power line; and 1 was shot by a federal soldier. The Guardsmen brought Robinson out of the building, then bayoneted and shot him. The police shot three other individuals during the same firefight, with one victim needing his leg amputated. The police came close to the building where the sniper lived and ambushed in the 3rd story building room by shooting him, making Sydnor the only sniper killed during the riot. Among the whites who died were 5 civilians, 2 firefighters, 1 looter, 1 police officer, and 1 Guardsman. Of the white sworn or military personnel killed, 2 firefighters died, with 1 stepping on a downed power line during attempts to extinguish a fire started by looters, while the other was shot while organizing fire units at Mack and St. Jean streets; 1 officer was shot by a looter while struggling with a group of looters; and 1 Guardsman was shot by fellow Guardsmen while being caught in the crossfire between the National Guard and looters. Only 1 white looter was killed by police while trying to steal a car part at a junkyard on the outskirts of the city. Death of Tanya Blanding[ edit ] The four-year-old girl was huddled in her living room of a second-floor apartment, a few steps from the intersection of 12th and Euclid, in the heart of the original riot area precinct Guardsmen reported one of their units under fire at the intersection and believed they had pinpointed it as coming from the apartment in which Tanya and her family lived. Tanya Blanding was dead. LeBlanc, 41, admitted firing the burst into the windows of the apartment where Tanya was found, after another Guardsman told him that sniper fire had come from there. LeBlanc fired negligently into the apartment. Arrests[ edit ] 7, people were arrested: Many of those arrested had no criminal record: Franklin and Aretha Franklin. He operated from the Hastings store until when the street was razed in order to build the Chrysler Freeway. Battle along with other business owners on Hastings St. After the first day of rioting, police authorities no longer permitted business owners to guard their shops. Days later, Battle returned to his record shop with his daughter Marsha Battle Philpot and they were met with "wet, fetid debris of what had been one of the most seminal record shops in Detroit. Social conditions[ edit ] Suburban homeowners in Detroit installed this sign in The legacy of housing segregation continued long afterwards, and most whites resisted fair housing measures in the years before the riot. Blacks encountered strong discrimination in housing and jobsâ€”they competed for lower scale work with rural white southern migrants as well as immigrants from southern and eastern Europe. Some of the patterns of racial and ethnic segregation based in part on the differing religions of the Americans and Europeans , persisted after other social discrimination had eased by the midth century. White mobs enforced the segregation of housing up through the s: These people are so anti-colored, much more than you in Alabama. The city had a large and prosperous black middle class ; higher-than-normal wages for unskilled black workers due to the success of the auto industry ; two black congressmen half of the black Congressmen at the time ; three black judges; two black members on the Detroit Board of Education ; a housing commission that was forty percent black; and twelve blacks representing Detroit in the Michigan legislature. Weeks prior to the riot, Mayor Cavanagh had said that residents did not "need to throw a brick to communicate with City Hall. In , the American Institute of Architects gave Detroit an award for urban redevelopment. The city had mature black neighborhoods such as Conant Gardens. In the early 20th century, waves of new immigrants and migrants had generally settled in areas founded on an ethnic base. As Paul Wrobel writes in Our Way: Housing segregation is just as bad, and it seems more noticeable in the larger cities. Although Cavanagh alienated many when he ran a failed attempt to earn the Democratic nomination to the U. Senate in , the city was proud of defusing a possible riot situation on Kercheval Street in Officials believed that police were capable of handling potential riot situations. After the riot, the Kerner Commission reported that their survey of blacks in Detroit found that none were "happy" about conditions in the city prior to the event. The areas of discrimination identified by Fine were: Edwards tried to recruit and promote blacks, but he refused to establish a civilian police review board, as African Americans had requested. Many whites perceived his policies as "too soft on crime. It claimed the "police system" was at fault for racism. They resented many police officers who they felt talked down to them, addressing men as "boys" and women as "honey" and "baby. The local press reported several questionable shootings and beatings of blacks by officers in the years before They believed that the police profited from vice and other crime in black neighborhoods, and press accusations of corruption and connections to organized crime weakened their trust in the police. According to Sidney Fine, "the biggest complaint about vice in the ghetto was prostitution. On July 1, a prostitute was killed, and rumors spread that the police had shot her. The police said that she was murdered by local pimps. Black residents felt police raids of after-hours drinking clubs were racially biased actions. Factors were a combination of changes in technology, increased automation, consolidation of the auto industry, taxation policies, the need for different kinds of manufacturing space, and the construction of the highway system that eased transportation. Major companies like Packard , Hudson , and Studebaker , as well as hundreds of smaller companies, went out of business. In the s, the unemployment rate hovered near 10 percent. As a result, workers, who could do so, left Detroit for jobs in the suburbs. Other middle-class residents left the city for newer housing, in a pattern repeated nationwide. In the s, the city lost about 10, residents per year to the suburbs. In the s, This was partially due to the union seniority system of the factories. Except for Ford, which hired a significant number of blacks for their factories, the other automakers did not hire blacks until World War II resulted in a labor shortage. With lower seniority, blacks were the first to be laid off in job cutbacks after the war. Moreover, blacks were "ghettoized" into the "most arduous, dangerous and unhealthy jobs. The blacks they hired got "the worst and most dangerous jobs: Many other blacks working outside manufacturing were relegated to service industries as waiters , porters , or janitors. Many black women were limited to work in domestic service. Its loss resulted in racial tensions, due to the dislocation of community networks as well as loss of housing. Several urban renewal projects after World War II, intended to improve housing, dramatically changed neighborhood boundaries and ethnic composition. Detroit undertook a series of urban renewal projects that especially affected blacks, who occupied some of the oldest housing. By discrimination, including then lawful deed restrictions , or by choice, from through the s, these were the first places where many blacks new to Detroit settled, as they did not have the money for newer housing. The city began planning for the massive Gratiot Redevelopment Project as early as Detroit was considered a world leader in urban renewal. Thus, many of the blacks who moved to the 12th Street area rented from absentee landlords and shopped in businesses run by suburbanites. Crime rates rose in the 12th Street area. Detroit Public Schools suffered from underfunding and racial discrimination before the riots. Underfunding was a function of a decreasing tax base as the population shrank while the numbers of students rose. From to , enrollment grew from , to ,, but the loss of tax base made less funding available. Exacerbating this inequity were the challenges in educating disadvantaged students. The Detroit Board of Education estimated it cost twice as much to educate a " ghetto child properly as to educate a suburban child. From to , black organizations continued to work to improve the quality of education of black students. Issues included class size, school boundaries, and how white teachers treated black students. The Citizens Advisory Committee on Equal Educational Opportunities reported a pattern of discrimination in the assignment of teachers and principals in Detroit schools. It also found "grave discrimination" in employment, and in training opportunities in apprenticeship programs. It was dissatisfied with the rate of desegregation in attendance boundaries. The school board accepted the recommendations made by the committee, but faced increasing community pressure. The NAACP demanded affirmative action hiring of school personnel and increased desegregation through an "open schools" policy. Foreshadowing the break between black civil rights groups and black nationalists after the riot, a community group led by Rev. Cleage wanted black teachers to teach black students in black studies, as opposed to integrated classrooms where all students were held to the same academic standards. A student newspaper article, censored by the administration, claimed teachers and the principal "taught down" to blacks and used social promotion to graduate kids without educating them. Students walked out and set up a temporary "Freedom School" in a neighborhood church, which was staffed by many volunteer Wayne State University faculty. By May sympathy strikes were planned at Eastern, and

Rev. Albert Cleage had taken up the cause. City residents voted against a school-tax increase. Johns, the former head of the Detroit chapter of the NAACP, was hired in to advance community involvement in schools, and improve "intergroup relations and affirmative action. In stores serving black neighborhoods, owners engaged in "sharp and unethical credit practices" and were "discourteous if not abusive to their customers. In , the Archdiocese of Detroit published one of the largest shopper surveys in American history. Some of the differences were due to economies of scale in larger suburban stores, as well as ease in transportation and delivery of goods. Blacks and whites in Detroit viewed the events of July in very different ways. Part of the process of comprehending the damage was to survey the attitudes and beliefs of people in Detroit. African-Americans supported " integration " by 88 percent, while only 24 percent of whites supported integration. Residents of the 12th Street area differed significantly from blacks in the rest of the city however. For example, 22 percent of 12th Street blacks thought they should "get along without whites entirely".

Email Last Updated Dec 2, 1: Michigan is the third state in which Stein sought a recount, after Wisconsin and Pennsylvania. There is no timetable yet on when the court will hear this suit. And there is no reason to rewrite Michigan election law to accommodate the conspiracy-minded requests of an acknowledged loser. We need to verify the vote in this and every election so that Americans can be sure we have a fair, secure and accurate voting system. The results were finally certified on Monday, almost three weeks after Election Day. Recount rules and requirements are different in every state. The processes in Wisconsin and Pennsylvania , the other states with pending recount efforts, show the rules governing them can be pretty complicated. How much will it cost? When will it start? State elections officials have authorized the 19 largest counties in the state to begin a recount on Friday and would continue through the weekend. Then, officials would move on to the surrounding counties. All ballots would be counted by hand in each county, with state elections officials supervising the process each step of the way. If another candidate were to contest the recount, the process of counting the ballots would be put on hold until the Board of Canvassers can rule on the challenge. However, with a challenge it could be difficult for Michigan to meet the Dec. So Trump can contest the recount? Yes, and they did on Thursday. Will a recount change the outcome? Stein is seeking recounts in three states: Wisconsin, Pennsylvania and Michigan. In , the Green Party did succeed in obtaining a recount in Ohio in the presidential race. Bush beat John Kerry in Ohio by , votes, instead of , The recount concluded on Dec.

AP Top 25 Takeaways: Buying in on the Wolverines this season has taken time, understandably. Through three seasons as coach of his alma mater, Harbaugh has been more of a headline-maker than a big-game winner. With all that attention and money comes great expectations, and Harbaugh had not delivered at a level equivalent to his paycheck and celebrity. In , the Wolverines were a debatable spot away from beating Ohio State and playing for a Big Ten championship. Hard to call that disappointing. Last season, having to replace 11 NFL draft picks, Michigan regressed. This season started with a loss at Notre Dame and more reason to pile on Harbaugh as Michigan fell to on the road against ranked teams since That streak is gone, and Harbaugh is even with Michigan State and Mark Dantonio, though definitely not buddy-buddy with the Spartans coach. The Wolverines had a lot to say after beating Michigan State, Harbaugh included. Forget about all that now. The last two weeks Michigan has beaten Wisconsin and Michigan State, two teams that beat the Wolverines last season, by a combined , and both the Badgers and Spartans were fortunate to score that many points. The offense is still in good-not-great territory, but quarterback Shea Patterson brings potential for the Wolverines to keep up with more explosive teams. The first selection committee rankings will come out Oct. Next up on the revenge tour is No. The regular season ends in Columbus, Ohio. Harbaugh is against the Buckeyes and ultimately he will be judged by how that one goes. The Buckeyes are a one-dimensional offense and an all-or-nothing defense. Brohm not only played quarterback for the school, but he was born there and went to high school in the city. And if Louisville does come up with the dough, is home enough of a draw for Brohm? It was for Scott Frost to return to Nebraska last year. Louisville and North Carolina are the hottest spots, and neither of those jobs is all that much better than Purdue. Brohm could easily wait it out for something bigger. Louisville is no Nebraska. Even this watered down version of Nebraska football, years from being a serious national championship contender, is a program with a much higher ceiling than Louisville. The Crimson Tide have done nothing to make anyone doubt its status. The Tigers had a couple of early scares, but now they look exactly like who we thought they were. Clemson turned aside No. Clemson has suffered a surprising upset in the ACC the past two seasons on the way to the conference title and the playoff. The Crimson Tide, meanwhile, head into an off week, yet to be tested and on pace to set a record for scoring. The Tide go to No. Alabama and Clemson have met in the playoffs three straight seasons, with Alabama winning twice. The last time Wazzu beat Oregon four straight was Coach Mike Leach gets a lot of attention, a lot good and some not so good, for his train-of-thought musing and quirkiness. He also continues to be one of the better head coaches in college football, skilled at replacing quarterbacks and assistant coaches. His act might not play everywhere, but few coaches squeeze more out of their resources. Auburn is off next week, but November should be interesting on the Plains with No. The Cornhuskers play Bethune-Cookman next week, the game it added to replace the Akron game that was canceled by severe weather in September Pretty good so far. The Sooners held the Horned Frogs to yards and 5. The Horned Frogs peaked against Ohio State and have been regressing ever since, but still a good step for the Sooners. The senior had 15 tackles, giving him a nation-leading for the season, and an interception for the 15th-ranked Huskies against Colorado.
