Alana Uncategorized Introduction from Alana: January is National Mentoring Month and it has me thinking a lot about mentorship and the people who have helped to shape my life and set me on various paths to success. Marcia is a writer, researcher and author. Inspired by outstanding mentors, she became fascinated by the reach of key relationships and connecting elements and their influence on the personal narrative. The book is one I go back to frequently â€” sometimes I read it from cover to cover; other times, I simply turn to one story or another as a source of inspiration from people who have benefitted from their own mentor-mentee relationships. Those rich stories from history were the inspiration for collecting contemporary stories. Nobody I know has given more thought or conducted more research on the topic of mentorship than Marcia. Not only does she know a lot about it, she lives it. Having had a number of important mentors herself, Marcia pays those lessons forward as a mentor to so many others. I, for one, consider her one of my most important mentors and a person I turn to time and again for guidance and support. Contemporary Mentoring Stories Finish this sentence: A neighbor, a coach, a teacher or boss who believed in you, opened a door, gave a much needed reality check or inspired a life path. For all the benefits of advancing technology and communicating in real time, we sacrifice some of those well-worn, natural opportunities â€” specifically, the sharing of knowledge and wisdom through mentoring. The crush of those real time expectations has a long-term impact. We do not have the time. We cannot see a tangible outcome or benefit. Perhaps more accurately, we are not sure exactly what a mentor does or how to go about building a mentoring relationship. Mentoring is an ancient practice. Sharing our knowledge and experience is in our DNA. We like to make connections on all different kinds of levels from personal interests to shared experiences to professional skills to content expertise. As with most relationships, mentoring often comes down to proximity. Then, as our world expands, mentors often appear in bosses, community friends and leaders. The stories come from thought leaders we know: In learning their stories, I was heartened to discover that despite the notoriety that so many of these individuals enjoy, just like you and me, their success hinged on the support of their mentors. To get started, it is often worthwhile to think about the people in your life that have already made a difference. Who were they, where in your life did they appear? Is there someone you would like to reconnect with and build on your earlier foundation? If not, perhaps there is someone in your current network you admire. Reach out for an exploratory visit. When approaching a mentoring relationship remember that, as with all relationships, it is reciprocal. There must be an element of give and take. January is National Mentoring Month â€” a time to initiate and celebrate those relationships of believing.

Because You Believed in Me uses stories of real people Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Claude Monet and Eugene Boudin, Ulysses www.nxgvision.com and Abraham Lincoln to demonstrate the powerful benefits of mentoring.

As is often the case in the lives of country music performers, his early years were spent in rural hardship as his parents and siblings traveled around in a remodeled school bus where they sought farm work of many different kinds. Eventually the family moved to Paris, Texas where Gene attended school before dropping out in the ninth grade. At this point he went to work in the auto salvage business and learned to repair cars. To this day, after years at the top in the music business, he still owns his own body shop and remains a car fanatic. They approached Gene with a view to making records. I was recording for Wide World Records and when they parted Roy agreed to give Russ Reeder his half of my contract, and Russ gave him all of Wide World and all of the masters. Despite its steamy subject matter which initially caused it airplay problems, it came to the attention of Capitol Records who took over distribution of the single and signed Gene to the label. The record peaked at No. For the next five years Gene scored no less than seventeen top twenty hits for Capitol, ten of which made the top ten. He never told me how or what to record. The hits continued throughout that decade, later with Curb in and and from then on with Epic until , always recording traditionalist honky tonk country music of the highest order. When his contract with Epic expired, he concentrated on working on the road, eventually playing some dates with a young, up and coming artist named Randy Travis , who was managed by the woman who discovered him, Lib Hatcher Randy and Lib later married in With Russ Reeder now retired, Gene turned to Hatcher for management. Unfortunately things did not work out well and a long legal wrangle ensued which effectively prevented him from signing with another label. During this time the artist was now with Warner Brothers although when the label became aware of the legal situation, they dropped Gene from their roster. But it seemed everywhere I turned I was going down a blind alley. At this low point in his career, Gene was on the verge of quitting. With the advent of the new century, Gene had mixed fortunes; in he was diagnosed with colon cancer, although after rigorous hospital treatment, he was declared well enough again to continue with his heavy touring schedule. The critical response and success of the venture has led Hux to follow this up. These tracks are quintessential Gene Watson and capture an artist at the very top of his form.
