ACT Growing bonsai can be tricky to master but that is not deterring an increasing number of Canberrans keen to try their hand at miniaturising trees. Jennifer Mottlee from the Canberra Bonsai Society said there had been a 20 per cent jump in membership since the National Bonsai and Penjing Collection opened at the National Arboretum in Supplied "The collection is quite inspirational and what we all aspire to," she said. The 12th National Exhibition of Australian Plants as Bonsai features 38 trees from private collections, including a year-old baeckea and a Daintree pine. Ruth McLucas has been growing bonsai for more than 35 years and specialises in using Australian native plants. Begin with a species that has a high chance of survival, eg maple, Chinese elm or fig. Choose a tree that appeals to you: Choose a tree that has a lot of branches so you have more choice with how you shape the tree. Choose a pot that is the right style, size and colour for your tree. Learn about your tree; know what it needs to grow. What climate does it prefer? How will it respond to cutting back? How much water does it need? What fertiliser is best? Over time, learn the artistic principles behind shaping a tree. Visualise an old tree of the same type in the bush or a garden, and think of how you can make your young tree look old by removing branches and opening up the foliage. Know where to find information: Growing Australian natives as bonsai can be tricky, especially with species like eucalypts. Ms Mottlee said native Australian trees responded differently compared to northern hemisphere plants when transformed into bonsai. If you prune back onto the hard wood you run the risk of losing that whole branch," she said.
