Chapter 1 : Dale Carnegie® Leadership Training for Managers®

For over a century, Dale Carnegie has been improving individual and business performance around the world.

A leader will not only manage the daily operations of a business and have strong negotiation skills, but will also inspire your employees to live the company values and go above and beyond. We are not always lucky enough to find natural born leaders. However, we can train our managers to lead. Here are the top options for business owners looking for management leadership training.

In-House Training Most manager training is done on the job in the form of in-house training. This top-down approach is an acceptable option for management leadership training. It allows the business owner to customize the training for the specific role, industry and person involved. The financial investment is minimal. However, this form of management leadership training requires a leader that is willing to take time to do it. Some leaders are better than others. Your managers may benefit from training with multiple people. If you are looking to follow traditional training patterns and have specific leadership qualities in mind, in-house training is one option for management leadership training.

Training Technology Technology, particularly the internet, has made many aspects of our jobs simpler. Why not apply the same method to management leadership training? Webinars are forums where leaders can directly address their managers one-on-one or in groups. This is an excellent way to supplement traditional distance training programs. It requires preparation from training managers to develop the tools. However, overall it is a relatively inexpensive option. You can reach a lot of people in a short time with such a method. However, employee interaction and team building may be weak if the training is not reinforced in person. You may wish to consider webinars, audio CDs, DVDs and online videos for management leadership training. This is especially true if you have a large team and the ability to design such a program.

Live Seminars And Workshops If you prefer to send your managers out of the office for management leadership training, you may wish to consider live seminars and workshops. The beauty of these events is that they are often hosted by leading professionals from a variety of industries. You may even be able to book something with a top performer in your field. Live business seminars are typically somewhat lecture oriented. However, many may include supplemental workshops offering hands-on group work. These can be a little expensive, but many managers find this method rewarding. It provides them a chance to escape the typical work environment and shows the company is willing to invest money in their staff. If you can afford it, think about sending your potential leaders to a live seminar or workshop for their management leadership training.

Consultation Hiring a consultant is a way to combine in-house training with a live seminar for management leadership training. You hire a professional leadership consultant to meet with the business owner or the executive leadership team. In these in-person and online meetings you can detail exactly what it is you are looking for from your team and customize the training sessions. This can be expensive, but it is an excellent form of management leadership training because it is thorough. It is also excellent because all levels of the business can be involved. If you can afford this option, you may want to consider it. This is especially true if you have significant leadership concerns that require hands-on training from an outside source.

Formal Academic Training Business schools offer management leadership training in a formal academic setting. This type of management leadership training may be in the form of workshops at the local college or a full graduate degree. These programs are time consuming and require a significant investment from the business owner. The advantage of these programs is that they generally involve all of the best parts of each method discussed in this post. In addition, there is significant oversight to ensure all parties are learning accordingly. If your business is highly specialized and you can afford this option, you may wish to consider formal academic management leadership training.

Dale Carnegie Training One such option for formal leadership training programs for managers is offered by Dale Carnegie Training. In addition, this program teaches the 8-step delegation process for managers, which greatly improves management skills overall. If you can afford to send your managers to a formal training program like the one offered by Dale Carnegie or similar, it is definitely a worthwhile option to consider. Team Building Activities The attribute of leadership can be developed through team building exercises. The skills of working with a team and all the people around them is what makes a leader great. In order to hone those management leadership skills, team building activities offer as a training opportunity to build relationships and learn about others. It offers a new environment to establish trust, resolve conflicts and work together. You can try various types of team building activities like blindfold challenges, back-to-back drawings and life highlights. As managers get to know their team better, they will improve their overall management leadership training on a personal level. Depending on the size of your business and the industry in which you are involved, some of the management leadership training options listed here may be more suitable than others. A small company that makes decent money may wish to send their managers to seminars for leadership training. Large corporations will probably use a combination of in-house training and technology webinars, videos, etc. All methods have success within a variety of businesses, but not all options are equal. Be sure to consider these options when looking at the types of leadership training available to you.

Leadership Training for Managers: 3 Day In Person How to build a culture of engagement in which team members are confident with their abilities, empowered to succeed, enthusiastic to deliver results, and inspired to make a difference is central to this multi-day experience.

Baby Boomers are retiring now and retirements will peak around , leaving a huge talent gap. The 1 need in business today is to hire, develop, and retain those who will be leading at every level of their businesses. What are the skills and attitudes required to be that leader? The following habits help managers execute initiatives, get results, and build people. Effective leaders lead teams. They practice alignment, engaging others in common goals and commitments. Putting people in the right roles and effectively delegating tasks and accountability Customer focused. Put systems in place that measure results and give consistent feedback to the appropriate people. Delegating, decision making and problem solving. There are key steps to each that they practice over and over again. Inspiring and motivating others. Effective leaders listen at a high level and communicate with passion. Like any discipline, these two skills take consistent practice. How do you stack up with these skills? The Dale Carnegie Leadership Training for Managers helps you develop these leading, coaching, and management habits. As a side benefit, you will gain increased spirit and confidence from the clarity of the material, practicality of the process and genuine application time. You will become skilled, and inspired; an incredible combination! The Missing Ingredient in courses, training, and seminars. Most training does not connect you to the reality of your business and organization. Each skill you master impacts directly on actual job performance and your real world. You are actively involved through practice, group discussion and application projects. Then, using the Dale Carnegie spaced learning approach, each skill is reinforced with application until it becomes part of your personal management style. This systematic application and follow up turns abstract business concepts into business behavior, with long term benefits. You will have the execution skills required to move you and your team forward. Our results oriented training takes place over a period of 3 days, once per week for 3 weeks. The time spaced learning format allows for real world application of concepts between sessions as well as a forum to report back on results achieved. This approach will also help you achieve skill development in the following areas.
