Chapter 2 : Gore Creek Trail to Buffalo Pass - Colorado | AllTrails

Deluge Lake - Miles Round-Trip Deluge Lake is located miles from Gore Creek Trailhead in the Eagles Nest Wilderness north of Vail. It sits above treeline at the head of a broad valley deep in the Gore Range.

James Dziezynski Made Possible by Curated by Boulder backpackers looking for an epic time in the mountains are faced with a wonderful dilemma. Within roughly an hour of the city are three premier backpacking destinations: Pristine alpine lakes, towering summits, flower-drenched alpine fields, and even ghostly graves await—and nearly all of these can be experienced in a three-day backpack. This journey immerses backpackers in wilderness areas that see surprisingly little traffic, considering how easy they are to access. Directions This adventure begins at the Meadow Creek Trailhead. Take Exit off I If coming from the east, take the second road in the turnabout. If coming from the west, take a left off the exit, go over the I bridge and enter the turnabout, passing the exit ramp for eastbound I and the next road before hitting turnoff. The ending trailhead is Deluge Creek in Vail. Take Exit from I Coming eastbound, take a left off the exit and go under the I bridges to Big Horn Road. From the west, continue straight off the exit to reach the same place. Follow the road about 2 miles until it again goes under the I bridge. At a well-marked bend in the road is the Deluge Lake Trailhead. There is plenty of parking. Red Peak looms in the distance. A mixture of pine trees and white aspen groves line the start of the trail. As the highway traffic fades away, the namesake creek intersects the trail and the climb towards your first goal, Eccles Pass, begins in earnest. In just over three miles, a series of ponds announce the broad, open meadows on the south side of Eccles Pass. However, the best is still to come. From the top of the pass, ambitious hikers can drop their heavy packs head west to the 12,foot Deming Mountain or east to 12,foot Eccles Peak. This is your destination for night 1. Strong hikers who get a very early start to avoid storms can set up camp, then head up to 13,foot Red Peak to the north. But you may just be too enchanted by the calm alpine lakes and wildflower display to go farther. Follow it up and over Red Buffalo pass. The west side of Red Buffalo Pass is steep but the trail is easy to follow. Views extending down the valley to Vail are quite remarkable. Continue down along the trail until you come across the graves of Daniel and Andrew Recen, early Swedish settlers in the region. The grave marks the start of the Gore Lake Trail. From here, it is 1. If you really want privacy, go off-trail another 1. Heck, you can even grab lunch and clean clothes from your second vehicle. Even though the mileage is low, the trail climbs over 2, of vertical elevation—a burly task with a backpack! However, the reward is camping the Deluge Lake Basin. It can get mighty windy, so set up camp in the trees around the open tundra. Day 3 - Hike Out Taking a break with friends along the trail. Those camped at Deluge Lake have the option of scoring the toughest peaks on the route but by Gore Range standards, average work. To the northwest is 13, ft. Grand Traverse Peak, an utter class 2 grind and likely the least palatable option. Snow Peak is off to the east and offers a steep climb to the Snow Pass saddle before an engaging, excellent class 3 ridge to the summit. Connected to Snow is 13, ft. The route finding is difficult. An interesting additional option five days is to park at the trailhead on the west side of the Eisenhower Tunnel only accessible off I eastbound, a few hundred feet after exiting the tunnel and hike up and over Coon Hill and along the Williams Fork Range 13 miles before walking through Silverthorne a short distance along the roads, then connecting with the Gore Range Trailhead to South Willow Creek, which eventually leads seven miles to the Red Buffalo Pass basin.
