Chapter 1 : Formats and Editions of Direct social work practice : theory and skills [www.nxgvision.com]

Part of the Brooks/Cole Empowerment Series, the tenth edition is completely up to date and thoroughly integrates the core competencies and recommended practice behaviors outlined in the Educational Policy and Accreditation Standards (EPAS) set by the Council on Social Work Education (CSWE).

Rather than specifying a particular theory, direct practice is seen as an eclectic process structured by the problem-solving process with the guiding underlying principles of sensitivity to social diversity and promotion of social and economic justice. At the micro level, this most often involves bringing services to and improving the quality of life of people who are vulnerable and oppressed. However, direct practitioners must also be able to assess different systems levels beyond the individual and determine the appropriate intervention and its appropriate level micro, meso, and macro, and to know when and how to implement various theories. This complex undertaking is not taught in a systematic way but rather is guided by the development of personal awareness, knowledge of social work values and ethics, sensitivity to social diversity, and promotion of social justice. Generalist practice encompasses a wide array of theories and approaches but contains the following common elements Compton, et al. First, it involves the problem-solving process, which was originally devised by Helen Perlman see Theories for Direct Practice. Defined in slightly different ways by various writers, problem solving basically involves the phases of the helping process: Social work practitioners are encouraged to use an eclectic theory basis in this process. Second, generalist practice involves the general ability to work across systems individuals, families, groups, agencies, and communities using the problem-solving process. The textbooks listed here— Hepworth, et al. The latter will not be covered here as they do not depart significantly from the textbooks listed. Beyond individuals, families, and groups, Shulman has an additional emphasis on communities. Gambrill is also noted here because it too is used as a foundation-level, direct-practice text. It is different from the others in that its major focus is on evidence-based practice. States that a more contemporary addition to the helping process in social work is a solution or strengths-finding phase as part of assessment. Both US and Canadian perspectives are provided. The text also emphasizes behavioral theory as an approach for working with clients because of its evidence basis. Less of an emphasis is placed on basic interviewing skills and multicultural social work. Rooney, and Kimberly Strom-Gottfried. Direct social work practice: This is the most widely used textbook for the foundational direct practice class at the Master of Social Work level, perhaps because of its clear and basic writing style. The skills of helping individuals, families, groups, and communities.
