Noted orchid fancier Nero Wolfe hosts a flower show at his New York brownstone. A beautiful but inebriated young woman desperately wants to speak to the busy host but is diverted to his office by Archie, who is doing security duty.

We have 20, 30 people in our repertory company and we get great actors to play bit roles. Cramer in the same episode, " The Silent Speaker. In the mids he established a friendship with the Stout estate and was working with his father, Henry Jaffe, a successful attorney turned producer, when the Nero Wolfe rights came on the market. Jaffe said he chose to stick with the era for the adaptations "because I thought there was so much style that people could identify with and that we could play off. Ultimately, the most important thing is that the audience remain removed from the show by three or four decades. It was, as far as I know, the first TV series without a single original script " each and every episode was based on a Rex Stout novel, novella, or short story. What a stunner it is to find them translated so effectively to television. You have to believe in the characters and respect the formality of the way they are characterized. She devoted most of her attention to the dialogue: Frequently I end up moving words " tenderly and respectfully " but retaining as much of the language as possible. I feel a great belief in Rex Stout. I see the script process as writing his second draft. The success of the series is significant especially because the scripts remained remarkably faithful to the novels. The programs are set in the period, and much of the dialogue is lifted directly from the novel. Effective novelistic dialogue is not usually effective screen dialogue, as Raymond Chandler discovered when he worked on the script for the film of James M. Credit certainly goes to the skills of the repertory actors who played the roles, and especially to Maury Chaykin and Timothy Hutton; but it was Stout who supplied the language and the characters who speak it. And it was Stout who created in words the real pleasures of the novels: Producer Michael Jaffe realized this, and with great care recreated those pleasures on film. I can no longer read a Stout novel without seeing him, or hearing his voice. Still, Archie could have wandered out of any number of screwball comedies; Nero Wolfe is a far more complicated proposition. Maury Chaykin has doubtless immersed himself in the Wolfe novels, for he brings to his interpretation of the part both a detailed knowledge of what Stout wrote and an unexpectedly personal touch of insight. He plays Wolfe as a fearful genius, an aesthete turned hermit who has withdrawn from the world and from the opposite sex in order to shield himself " against what? Stout never answers that question, giving Chaykin plenty of room to maneuver, which he uses with enviable skill. In , The Black Mountain was in the number five position. Last year, I spent a very late evening reading a very valuable edition of the Koran. Baring-Gould and Ken Darby , [26] and she created a complete floor plan to match the detailed descriptions of the brownstone found in the Nero Wolfe corpus. John Berrie was director of photography for the second season, [29] which was shot in high-definition video. Their landmark series Centre Street At first Hutton was a little nervous about it, but after Jaffe brought experienced DP John Berrie to the program, Hutton was convinced. For Wolfe, Hargadon said, "I tried to find fabrics that were thick, to sort of even enhance his size more, things that would be structured to hold a big shape.

The Gun With Wings. An opera singer with injured throat seemingly shot himself. The police is convinced it is a suicide, but a couple of lovers know one fact which turns this into a murder. They hire Nero Wolfe to find the killer. This novel is very notable for the fact that the murder weapon was very busy travelling places seemingly all by itself without any outside help, thus the title. Thi This anthology consists of three novellas: This made for a very nice and intriguing mystery. A man liked riding his horse every morning. One day the horse came back without its rider who was found dead along the trail. The suspicion is centered on a group of people who are obviously not very happy about it, so Nero Wolfe has to do the work which police is unable to. It turns out, Archie Goodwin does not like horses a new fact and the police does not like Archie Goodwin there is nothing new about it. Archie Goodwin, being Archie Goodwin took upon himself to entertain the most attractive woman of the crowd. She makes a small talk with him telling the typical things: OK so this is not a typical small talk after all. Now it is personal for him and Archie. To finally catch the killer Nero Wolfe devises a scheme which puts Archie Goodwin into a really dangerous situation. The latter actually volunteers being pissed off at overlooking the murder which happened right under his nose. Archie shows he can keep his wits in tight situations. This is the first time I read these novellas. The rating is 4 stars; usual for a book of the series.
