Chapter 2 : Sexual Abuse as a Public Health Problem | ATSA

Fourth National Symposium on Child Abuse: a collection of papers presented at a national meeting in Charleston, South Carolina, October 23, , to explore on an interdisciplinary basis the problems of child abuse and neglect.

Sexual abuse is a serious national problem that cannot be solved solely by responding to abuse after it has been perpetrated. While the criminal justice and related systems may offer deterrence, incarceration, rehabilitation, and restitution, these efforts to foster community safety are implemented only after the detection and commission of a crime. A complementary approach to prevent sexual abuse from being perpetrated in the first place is necessary. Public health prevention efforts encourage us to shift our focus from intervention and treatment following an assault to primary prevention, that is, the prevention of sexual abuse before it is perpetrated. Recent national surveys have demonstrated that sexual abuse is a widespread problem in the United States Whitaker et al. Later research confirmed these numbers: Using data from Child Protective Service workers and a survey of a nationally representative sample of community professionals, the Fourth National Incidence Study of Child Abuse and Neglect NIS-4 estimated that , children were sexually abused in the United States in Sedlak et al. These rates take on added significance when compared to rates of other major public health concerns. There is also widespread recognition that the prevention of child sexual abuse is a critical public health concern. Child sexual abuse is known to increase the risk of a wide range of behavioral issues, mental health disorders and adjustment difficulties in childhood and later in adult life Dong, et al. Public health approaches to problems like sexual abuse move beyond ensuring the health of individuals; it addresses the health of an entire population CDC, Sexual violence is a widespread problem that affects not just the victim, but the offender and the families and communities around both of them; it is just the sort of social issue to be targeted by a public health prevention approach which emphasizes prevention before sexual violence occurs. A public health focus on prevention has the potential to diminish the number of sexual offenders in the general population and to diminish sexual victimization in the community. Enhancing protective factors to increase our ability to prevent victimization and perpetration may include incorporating into school curricula interpersonal skills-building training for boys and young men or the implementation of mass campaigns that target communities with information about the importance of consent in sexual encounters Finkelhor, , and the laws regarding sexual assault. It is important to note that only a small number of public health prevention programs have been evaluated adequately enough to determine their effectiveness and offer recommendations for widespread implementation Institute of Medicine as quoted in National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, The utilization of an ecological model for the development of sexual violence prevention strategies is considered ideal: Public health challenges society to accept responsibility for stopping sexual abuse by changing norms both within relationships and within communities, and voicing objections to such violence. The Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers encourages the recognition of sexual abuse as a public health issue. Given the magnitude of the problem and its physical and mental health impact, ATSA recognizes sexual abuse as an important public health problem. The Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers supports the development of a national public health surveillance system for sexual abuse that includes reported, as well as unreported, cases of sexual abuse. ATSA supports the development of a national public health surveillance system for sexual abuse that includes officially reported as well as unreported cases of sexual abuse. Department of Justice, Further, research suggests that reported cases of childhood rape are different from unreported cases of childhood rape. Specifically, reported cases are more likely to involve strangers Hanson et al. Surveillance data that broadens the view of both victim and perpetrator will have an impact on the shifting of norms that influence policy. The Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers encourages researchers to conduct studies and publish data to increase understanding of risk factors and protective factors related to sexual abuse perpetration and victimization, and recommends that such efforts be funded. ATSA encourages funding for researchers to conduct studies and publish data examining risk factors and protective factors related to sexual abuse perpetration and victimization. Public health scientists believe that ill health or unhealthy behaviors, including violence, are not randomly distributed in the population. These scientists are interested in conducting analyses on risk factors to find the reasons for this nonrandom distribution and the protective factors that might mitigate the expression of violence. Risk factor research focuses on understanding what factors place an individual at higher risk for unhealthy behaviors such as sexual deviance or unhealthy consequences such as sexual victimization. The intent of such research is to find out whether particular situations or behaviors put persons at greater risk for victimization or perpetration. Identification of a risk factor indicates that developing sexually aggressive behaviors or becoming a victim of sexual abuse is statistically more likely if there is exposure to a particular factor e. Identification of a protective factor indicates that developing sexually aggressive behaviors or becoming a victim may be less likely when exposed to a particular factor e. The presence of any one protective or risk factor does not predict definitively the development of sexually aggressive behaviors or the likelihood of victimization by sexual aggression. The Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers supports the development of primary prevention and early intervention programs based on risk and protective factor and related research. Since it is generally easier to alter developing behaviors than behaviors that are ingrained, ATSA also supports the development of universal and early intervention programs. Points of intervention may focus on the development of appropriate social and emotional skills as well as family, community and cultural factors that may contribute to the development of sexual offending Whitaker et al. Evaluation of prevention programs targeting various segments of society e. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and other federal agencies in the United States in their pursuit of rigorous research to evaluate the effectiveness of programs designed to prevent the perpetration of, and victimization by, sexual abuse, and to ensure that these programs have no iatrogenic effects that may impede the prevention of sexual violence.
