There are many strong feelings and opinions involved. Coincidentally, making such calls in a match often awakens strong feelings and opinions from players, coaches and fans. The truth is, even among officials, we all see the game somewhat differently. Some calls that you might think are clear and easy might be unclear and somewhat difficult or vice-versa. Experience level and background can be factors in determining what we decide are the toughest calls. If we vary so much on deciding what is difficult as officials, how can we really expect that coaches are going to react favorably when we make that tough call in a match? I recently conducted an informal survey of some officials to get their thoughts on the topic. I asked them to list what they viewed as the three toughest calls and then to name the one call they thought every official must have on their list and defend their rationale. After reviewing some strong opinions from my fellow officials, I chose what I view as the three toughest calls for officials of various levels. Each of the following three calls appeared on multiple lists. As serve-receive schemes and alignments have evolved over the years, it gets even tougher to recognize the slight adjustments made to hide the setter, position their outside hitter closer to the left side or whatever the other purposes might be behind their alignments. Officials are expected to decipher those schemes before every play “without exception! When it really comes down to it, the basics of the illegal alignment rule are not that complicated. There are only seven potential overlaps by players” four side-to-side and three front-to-back: To grasp the concept of illegal alignment, it is critical that an official understands those seven situations and how they are the only overlaps that can possibly be illegal. That rules foundation is absolutely necessary before trying to properly identify illegal alignments on the court. After gaining some experience and testing different theories, many officials will learn a technique that works for them. It might mean that an official works on using hair color or headband style to help indicate opposites. Different techniques work for different officials and there is no right or wrong way. The toughest part is that the official has to take all of that information into account and make a proper ruling in about one second. Officials must understand the rules behind the overhand pass “what is legal and what is not. It comes down to three things: Did it visibly come to rest? Are there multiple contacts? When it comes to prolonged contact, there is one question I am most often asked: It can be a pretty good guide, especially for new officials. Play at top of the net Is the setter back-row and where was he or she at the moment of contact? Where is the blocker? Who touched it first? Is that a back-row block or a back-row attack? The split-second calls at the top of the net might be some of the toughest. That is where experience plays a major role. There are things you can do to help with those calls as you gain experience. We might not remember what we said at the start of the rally. I often use my hands to help me officiate net play. When a setter is in the back row, I place the hand closest to that side gently on the stand with two fingers extended. If a setter is in the front row, I have an open hand on the stand. Then, as the play develops near the net, I can feel my fingers and know if I have a potential back-row player fault. The reality is that we get better at making the tough calls when we discuss them with other officials, when we seek advice to learn new things that can help us out, and when we work to incorporate that knowledge and those techniques into our own officiating.

If you are reading this as a non-beginner, and realise that your grip is less than ideal, spend the time trying to correct it. What does a correct table tennis grip look like? A correct shake-hands table tennis grip should have your index finger on the backhand rubber. Your thumb tucked in on the forehand side. The other three fingers loosely wrapped around the handle. Little to no gap between the top of the handle and your hand. A lot of beginners try to play with two fingers on the bat, or not fingers hammer grip. Many have too big a gap between their hand and the top of the handle. The correct grip has that crease directly in line with the edge of the bat. The backhand grip shifts that part of your hand round to the forehand side. The forehand grip does the opposite. The the hand moves around the bat the other way the crease comes onto the backhand side. Players that use these forehand or backhand-centred grips usually experience one of two problems; Some stick with one grip and end up with one good wing depending on which grip they have used and one poor wing. For example, having a backhand grip will give you the ability to have lots of control, because your thumb is on the bat, and develop a very wristy shot, because your grip has freed up your wrist to move. Others decide that they should switch between the two giving themselves the best of both worlds. This will often work in practice or at a level level when you have time to anticipate the ball and change your grip. Final points Here are a few final points to consider when thinking about your grip; Try to sort it out early, as a beginner, if you can but, if necessary, be prepared to move backwards slightly now in order to improve more in the future. Keep a nice soft loose grip on the handle of the bat. The tip of your index finger should, ideally, be on the backhand rubber as opposed to sticking off the edge of the bat. This will give you a bit more control on your forehand. Follow the tips mentioned above for an orthodox grip and then stick with it. Try to avoid changing grip during rallies. This is probably the area where you are most likely to have problems. Remember, everyone has a slightly different hand and a slightly different grip. You should feel comfortable and confident with your grip.
