It won the Australian Aurealis Award in , was 1 on The Age bestseller list, and a story based on the novel was awarded the Nebula Award. Reviews- Starred review from July 18, Devotees of M. Lovecraft, and Algernon Blackwood will relish this superior anthology of original stories reflecting what the editors call the "paradox of Victorian superstition-amidst-enlightenment. It seems almost unfair to single out individual works when all 17 are superb and will be cherished by steampunk and horror fans alike. July 15, Seventeen all-new tales emulating, or re-creating, the ambience of classic Victorian supernatural suspense. Not unexpectedly, London with its smog haunts of ill repute and real-life history is the favored, sometimes quite imaginary, but by no means exclusive venue. Lucius Shepard weighs in with a creepy tale of a ghost-trapping machine, obsession and incest. John Harwood writes a lethal manuscript. Laird Barron describes devilish sprits, some in human guise, roaming the wilds of Washington State. From Jeffrey Ford comes a fine tale from the early career of Cley, his splendidly deluded Physiognomist. Paul Park offers an eerie, jangling tale of New Orleans wherein nothing is what it seems and, indeed, seems to deny that anything ever could be. Clever and often impressive work that succeeds, mostly, in being more than a mere exercise in nostalgia. Washington Post "[A] collection of the eerie and fantastic. Lovecraft and Algernon Blackwood will relish this superior anthology of original stories It seems almost unfair to single out individual works when all 18 are superb and will be cherished by steampunk and horror fans alike. Among the hundred or so books I have read this year, this one is my favorite. Acquire it at all costs.

Chapter 2 : Ghosts by Gaslight - A Big Bus Company Ghost Walk (and Pub Crawl)

Ghosts by Gaslight: Stories of Steampunk and Supernatural Suspense is a collection of short stories by supposedly some of the best writers out there now in the realm of horror, suspense, and steampunk. I myself was not familiar with any of the authors and view this book as an excellent introduction to each.

As part of your ticket a few walks around the centre of town are thrown in. One of them is a ghost walk, so naturally we took them up on the offer. It starts quite slowly, the first stop-off being a twenty minute wait in the Sherlock Holmes pub by Charing Cross to allow any stragglers or late running buses to catch up. It is one of those pubs in London that I have visited several times, but only ever on an organised walk or some sort of pub crawl. The water gates behind Victoria Gardens date from when before the Embankment narrowed the Thames, and the York Water Gate is haunted by a drunken boatmen who drowned there whilst waiting to pick up his fare. Our next stop was just behind the water gate, where not only is the ghost of Samuel Pepys seen, but that of a suicidal young lady running to throw herself into the river. Our guide was certainly packing the stories in, as turning the corner and walking a little further we were at Durham House, haunted by Anne Boleyn. This was hard to take seriously, not because of the story itself, but because parked opposite was a van with a waiting workman sitting in the front seat, who kept lifting his head from his newspaper to look at our guide with an expression on his face that said "What the fuck are you talking about, mate? It tells of two different policemen accosted by a woman urging them to come to the banks of the river because someone was about to jump in, only for them to reach the Thames and see a women in identical dress throw herself over the edge. The walk was slowly leading us up to my old stomping ground from when I worked in Bush House, via The Strand - where we were told the story that The Savoy would not let anyone dine on a table of thirteen, instead using a statue of a cat, Casper, as a 14th guest - and Somerset House, where Nelson apparently appears though not, it should be noted, when we were there watching Idlewild the other week. The next pub stop was due to be The Devereux , a favourite haunt of the homepage team when we worked by Aldwych. It has a ghost story attached to it about the Earl of Essex, but as far as we were concerned it was a ghost pub - our guide had forgotten it was a Saturday and that the pub would be shut. Instead of supping there we headed along Fleet Street, and then cut up towards High Holborn. Especially when you know as a Londoner that dragging the Jack The Ripper story into the evening has a considerable geographic inaccuracy. Even more especially as the set-up to talking about the entirely fictional Sweeney Todd. This is a lovely old pub that we visited for special occasions when I worked at Holborn. It has a timbered vaulted ceiling, and plenty of intimate booths where back in the day lawyers and their clients would confer in confidence. Our final stop was to drop people off at Holborn station , and then a beer in the Princess Louise. We had a good chat with the Australians, and got the best haunted story of the night from them. Earlier in the day they had been on the bus and the guide started talking about Samuel Pepys. She turned round to talk to her, only to realise that the seat was empty, and her daughter was still sitting a few rows back on the bus Well that comes right at the beginning, as the place where we convened, on the corner of Trafalgar Square by the newest wing of the National Portrait Gallery still has gaslights.
