Students in first and second grade have a much shorter attention span than students in fifth or sixth grade. Utilize this difference by planning grammar activities that allow the kids to get up and move. Verb Charades Learning the difference between verbs and nouns is usually one of the first things kids learn about grammar. Prior to the activity, write down ten nouns that can be found in the classroom chalk, window, pencil and ten verbs jump, wave, smile on slips of paper. Mix them up in a bucket or hat. Have children sit at their desks. Review the difference between nouns and verbs. Explain that when they hear a verb, they need to do the activity. When they hear a noun, they need to find that object in the classroom. This can be an individual activity, with the teacher calling on students one at a time, or a group activity, with everyone participating at the same time. Touch and Feel Adjectives To do a touch and feel activity, gather approximately five to ten shoeboxes. Put an object with a certain texture, such as sandpaper, faux fur and tree bark, into each shoebox. Tape the lid on. Cut a small hole in the lid. Cover the boxes with newspaper or wrapping paper, making a small flap over the hole. Set the boxes up around the classroom. Talk about how adjectives describe nouns. Have students visit each box, writing down two or three adjectives to describe what they feel inside the box. After everyone returns to his or her seat, ask the kids to share their adjectives, and then allow them to guess what was inside the box based upon their adjectives. Sentence Diagrams Diagramming sentences helps students learn about subjects, predicates, pronouns, direct and indirect objects and more. Instead of having students diagram sentences individually at their desks, ask them to participate in a group diagram. Write three or four sentences on the chalkboard in plain white chalk. Divide students into groups, giving each group a different colored piece of chalk. Assign each group a particular part of the sentence. They must decide as a group the correct part of the sentence to underline, then go to the chalkboard, underline it and then explain to the class their reasoning. Older Group Grammar Activities: Elementary Although upper elementary students may seem too old for some grammar activities, elementary students of all ages enjoy a break from tedious pencil and paper work. Older elementary kids are often computer literate, making interactive grammar games on the Internet a favorite choice for both teachers and students. Use group activities to reinforce social and English skills in upper elementary students. Daily Oral Language Daily Oral Language, or DOL, is a grammar activity that often begins in first or second grade and can even continue into high school. The basic premise of DOL is to have students fix grammar, punctuation and spelling mistakes in incorrectly written sentences or paragraphs. As students get older, the mistakes become more complex. Make DOL a group activity by writing the sentence s on an overheard transparency or the chalkboard. Ask a different student to lead the class each day in fixing the mistakes. Not only does DOL review grammatical concepts, it also saves paper and gives kids leadership opportunities. Mad Grammar The popular game Mad Libs provides a lot of laughs on long car trips and in the classroom. Give it a twist to make it more interesting and educational for students. Instead of having students fill in an incomplete story with the proper word forms, give them a short creative writing assignment on the same topic, approximately 100 words. When they finish the writing assignment, have them go back and replace the nouns, adverbs, verbs, adjectives, objects and more with a blank line and the type of word needed, numbering the blanks. Pair the students up and have the partners give a new word for each blank. At the end of the activity, let students read their new stories aloud. Show students some of the Schoolhouse Rock grammar clips or listen to the songs online. Divide the students up into groups, assigning each one a part of grammar homonyms, prepositional phrases, compound sentences, conjunctions, etc. Let them work together for a week to come up with a song to one of their favorite tunes that describes the part of grammar they were assigned. At the end of the week, have students present their grammar songs to the class, complete with costumes and dance moves. Practicing good grammar is a part of this fundamental skill; teachers make it fun by incorporating grammar activities into their elementary classrooms. Was this page useful?

Student treasures Even as a young lover of literature, grammar was never my favorite subject. I know most of my students feel exactly the same way. Learning the rules of punctuation and structure can be less appealing to kids than the more obviously creative and fun aspects of writing. The following strategies are sure to give your grammar lessons that extra edge they need to be truly effective—and enjoyable. A picture, after all, is worth a thousand—or so they say. Sometimes visual aids are necessary for helping your elementary students grasp something as conceptual as grammar in concrete terms. And yes, believe it or not, Schoolhouse Rock is still a thing! Posters and other classroom decorations, whether bought at an educational goods store or hand-drawn by your students, help remind them of basic rules and provide a quick and easy guide to refer to when practicing writing. Ask each group to then generate a list of words that fall under their assigned category. Have them draw an illustration of that word first, then define and describe it or, for more advanced writers, write a story using it. Finally, publish their art and writing in a classbook that clearly illustrates the different parts of speech. Get Playful Grammar is surprisingly easy to turn into a game—and doing so makes it so much simpler to both teach and learn! Ask them to create a list on a separate piece of paper of just the types of words needed to fill in the blanks. Have them partner up and swap lists, filling in the blanks without seeing the original framed sentences. Be sure to have them read these aloud at the end! Pin the Punctuation on the Sentence. A literary twist on Pin the Tail on the Donkey, there are no blindfolds involved in this version of the game. Instead, create or buy a few oversized punctuation marks and write a sentence on the board at the front of the classroom. Have your students draw the marks blindly from a hat or bag and see if they can pin it to the board in a spot that makes grammatical sense. Before beginning, choose an overarching theme or subject for all of their framed sentences or paragraphs to adhere to. Once your students have completed a first draft, have them edit and revise their work as needed to ensure that everything makes sense, both logically and grammatically. Then, ask them to draw illustrations to accompany their writing. Finally, be sure to publish their work in a professionally printed and bound classbook! Get Creative Working with examples is especially important when it comes to teaching grammar in elementary school. Seeing the rules of writing in action helps illustrate the purpose and importance of those rules. However, as tempting as it is to simply use cut-and-dried examples straight from a textbook or other basic resource, a far more engaging lesson plan will involve thinking a bit farther outside the box. Try asking your students to bring in their favorite books to use as reference material. Ask them to copy a sentence, a paragraph or even a page from the book and identify different grammatical elements and how they affect the meaning of the text. Reading something they enjoy will motivate your students both to pay more attention and dig a little deeper when completing the assignment. Alternatively, you can hand-pick a few clips from popular age-appropriate movies or TV shows to use as examples. Transcribing the dialogue might be a bit difficult for your students, so you can use these clips in other ways—for instance, asking your students to raise their hands whenever someone uses a pronoun, or pausing after each sentence to ask what sort of punctuation mark should go at the end of it. After having your students write and revise a short story, you can take the lesson one step further by asking them to work together to create a collection of stories. By using visual aids, educational games and a little creative thinking, you can rest easy knowing your kids learning something—and liking it!
