Handbook for travellers in Greece by , Murray edition, in English - Ed. 7.

Bring these along with you: The hotels I recommend supply hairdryers in the rooms. Open long hours in high season, George offers: Minor Emergencies In the event of accident or medical emergency, your hotelier and my travel agents will be of assistance. In the past, I sometimes used one of the public cardphone booths, which use only prepaid phonecards, available from most kiosks, or periptera. Please discuss the best phones to rent or buy with my travel agents in Athens. I always rent a very small car, so I can traverse the streets of little Megalochori village, and I exercise one special precaution: Water Santorini is dry, dry, dry in high season! Make sure you keep cold bottled water in your mini-bars, and take bottles along with you when you go out: Laundry can be a problem for visitors staying over a week. If you need medical treatment in an emergency, please liaise through your hotelier or through Always En route Travel, or MeGa Travel. My favorite pharmacy on Santorini is located in Phira: Dehydration and windburn are also possibilities on Santorini. My water bottle is Velcro-ed to me for the duration of my stay, and I wear leather-masked aviator-style sunglasses to keep out the wind: Early-autumn visitors may find that the weather can change unpredictably. Dean and I were caught in early-October downpours year before last. We had rain-slickers with us, and used them for about three days of our two-week-long stay. Culture Shock Just a handful of assorted notes. This can be a very windy island, especially in late August and September, when the Cycladic wind from the north, the Meltemi, is blowing. I pack scarves and an anchorable sun hat, and bring wraparound sunglasses of some sort I know, I know: The wind can blow for a week at a time, and drive you a little bats. Binoculars are a must on this island: Sometimes, I think every man, woman and child in Greece is a five-pack-a-day smoker but, hey, some may smoke even more than that. Just go prepared for an assault on your lungs, and try to dine out of doors. Daytrips from Santorini Why not charter a sparkling new catamaran for a daytrip round the caldera, including stops for a swim and a gourmet lunch or dinner prepared on board; or take an even longer voyage to nearby Anafi island? Ted is a U. The couple are of Greek descent but met on Santorini, and then decided to make a profession out of their passion for sailing. So far, so very good. The catamaran trips provide visitors with a unique perspective on this magical island. Both the shared and private charters offer exclusive visits to the caldera and private bays accessible only from the sea. Access Ted and Dina at santorinisailing att.
