Hardcover "The Historical Dictionary of the Republic of Croatia" is a controversial book, beginning with its title. The Republic of Croatia became recognized as a sovereign country in 1991. The question that poses itself, before we even enter the contents of this dictionary, is whether it is at all possible to write the history of a state little more than two years after its international recognition, when the civil war from which it emerged had yet to reach its peak? Wrapping a political agenda in a "scientific", usually "historical," folder is just one of the methods employed in promoting a political goal into an internationally recognized status. The claim that a certain political aspiration has historical roots and that as such it has been an object of scientific research, makes the aspiration legitimate. Moreover, if it is not challenged it acquires the solidity of fact and paves the way to the desired changes. The conflict between current politics and history is an area of research that is probably not lacking material for exploration nowadays. This book expands the controversy, adding a new spin to it by insinuating itself, with all its disregard for the facts, its fabrications and prevarications in the reference section of a respected university library where academic research usually begins. Inaccuracy of data, one of the major problems with this book, strikes the reader from the very first pages. The infamous Nazi satellite state, the Independent State of Croatia, according to the authors, was proclaimed on April 10, 1941, Chronology xxiii exactly one year later than it really occurred on April 10, 1941. If the proclamation of the Independent State of Croatia were presented accurately in this book, it would have been viewed in the line of two other salient historical events which all happened within 8 days in April 1941, and the nature of this Nazi satellite country would have been self-evident. April 6, 1941, Attack on Yugoslavia with the bombing of Belgrade by German army. One of the longest entries, the "Borders of Croatia" 36 creates only further confusion since Croatia is also a geographical area having different borders from the Republic of Croatia. The following is perhaps a good illustration: The present interruption of the Croatian territory at Neum goes back to the same time, when Bosnia-Herzegovina was given access to the sea. It was a concession of Dubrovnik to the Ottoman Empire. It is exactly in this place that the Bosnian President Izetbegovic now wants a corridor to the sea for the Muslims. According to the authors of this book, although Neum has been a part of Bosnia and Herzegovina for about 500 years, Neum is here defined by the authors as a "present interruption of the Croatian territory. The next politically loaded statement informs that the Bosnian President Izetbegovic "now wants a corridor to the sea for the Muslims. The claim that it is the Bosnian President Izetbegovic who "wants" it suggests two things: And why does he want it? It is said that he wants it for Muslims, although he, as the president of the state, at least officially, represents all the nationalities who live in the state over which he presides. The same thing could have been described as a territorial dispute between the states of the Republic of Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, where Bosnia wants the borders to remain unchanged, claiming their control over Neum to be historically grounded, since years of their legitimate possession of Neum was only interrupted during World War II, when it was controlled by the Independent State of Croatia, a Nazi satellite state. But, such an account, although closer to the facts, would not make the Croatian claim sound justified. On the other hand entries that have nothing in common with the Croatian nation or the Republic of Croatia are included such as: It is characteristic that all those apparently unrelated entries have one thing in common - a Bosnian element. The explanation for such a criterion can be found in the phrase that "Croatia officially inherited the borders fixed by the former Yugoslavia". This statement too is loaded with the implication that the present borders of Croatia are not the ones with which the Republic of Croatia should be content, because they are officially inherited, and inherited from the former Yugoslavia, which was a Communist country. Merely by that fact it should be questioned. And the way they were established by the former Yugoslavia is that they were "fixed". If something is "fixed" it is rather imposed than mutually agreed to. And what was imposed by the former Communist regime was, of course, not just! Questioning the borders of the Republic of Croatia to the extent and in the manner the authors did in this book, indicates a political agenda of Croatian territorial expansion into Bosnian territories. In view of such claims, this book could also be perceived as a piece of propaganda rather than an impartial historical overview. It is worth exploring how this book was placed in the reference section of a reputable university library Robarts Library - University of Toronto , and what the motives of the publisher to promote this manuscript were.
