Though I utilized the homework agenda for many years prior to the book, it fits right in to the idea of only keeping things that bring you joy. One thing is for sure, papers do not bring a teacher joy. I am also aware that homework, brings on another conversation: Side note, my first year I had Grading Homework, Yes or No? Goodness, this is a decision you have to make for you and the best interest of your students. I am not a fan of completion grades. I always encouraged students to work on math or come to my room for homework help. But, that means 40 students were doing math practice. I also believe that many students worked on it during that time because they knew it was for a grade. This helps to build intrinsic motivation. After I would check for completion during the warm up, then we would trade and grade the assignment. This had to happen quickly. Students would record it on their homework agenda and return it to the owner. I would then present a grading scale. This is where I might make math teachers crazy, but I would be generous. Eight questions, ten points each. Later in the class or the following day when I was going around, I was able to see on the front of the agenda how students were doing and discuss personally with them whether or not they needed to see me in tutorials. This is why I love the Homework Agenda. I tried that my first year and there was no hope. Since using it, I am quickly able to provide individual and specific feedback in a timely manner. It opens up conversations and helps be to encourage and be a champion for my students. Yes, there will be missing assignments. Yes, students will come to Thursday and have lost their precious agenda. My least organized student, who carried everything in their pocket, could fold that agenda up and hang onto it for a week. It was too valuable. Too many grades, too many assignments to redo. On Friday, I would collect the Homework Agenda. It was going in the grade book on Friday. There were a few other ways I attacked the missing assignments throughout the week, but for simplicity sake I will just share a general weekly process. List names of missing assignments on post-it note next to desk official, I know Monday: It would be a dream world if everyone turned in their work everyday. Unfortunately, we all live in reality. We can vent our frustrations over students not doing work, which is legitimate. We can also work towards solutions. I would love for us to be that voice of inspiration and encouragement. Sometimes that voice sounds like tough love and a hounding for assignments and just being consistent that you value their education and you are not willing to let them give up on it. They will appreciate it one day and you will be happy you did the extra work.
