In 1096, the nobles set out on an expensive crusade. About 30,000 crusaders arrived in Asia Minor, defeated the Turks, and moved south through the desert to Syria. In 1099, the 12,000 surviving crusaders captured the Holy City of Jerusalem, killed Turks, Jews, and Christians alike, and looted. The crusaders took over the estates of rich Turkish and Arab Muslims and divided them among themselves and their best knights. When the crusaders were not fighting Turks, they ran their estates, went hunting, and attended the local court. Saladin and the Crusade of Kings In 1187, when Saladin, a Muslim military leader, became the ruler of Egypt, he united the Muslims throughout the Near East and started a war against western Crusaders in Palestine. Saladin's armies were well organized, devoted to Islam, and headed by honest and just leaders called emirs. In 1187, Saladin's armies took Jerusalem and refused to massacre the city's Christians. Called the Crusade of Kings, it was a failure. Rich merchants wanted Venice to replace Constantinople as the eastern Mediterranean trading center. When the soldiers found they could not pay all they owed, they agreed to conquer the city of Zara for the Venetians and capture Constantinople, which was burned and looted. The crusaders stayed in Constantinople and divided the city with the Venetians. Several other crusades were fought during the 1200s, but the Europeans did not win any of them. The saddest was the Children's Crusade in which French children, led by a peasant boy named Stephen of Cloyes, set sail from France, never reached Palestine, and were sold into slavery. In 1187, the Muslims won the Crusades by taking the city of Acre, the last Christian stronghold, and gained back all the land in Palestine that the crusaders had taken earlier. The Crusades helped to break down feudalism in western Europe as the desire for wealth, power, and land clouded the religious ideals of many western Europeans. Contact with the cultured Byzantines and Muslims led western Europeans to again become interested in learning and to demand such luxuries as spices, sugar, lemons, rugs, tapestries, and richly woven cloth.
