People have been so stressed that, just before the presidential election, the American Psychological Association released a list of coping strategies to help adults deal with election-related stress. The focus has been on adults, yet teens and college-aged Americans are exposed to the same headlines. Turns out “ youth are feeling it, too. In our survey of 80 youth across the nation , published Feb. A barrage of news For some youth, may have been their first time voting in a presidential election, engaging in political conversations or even following the news. Twenty-four-hour-a-day news coverage in print, on the radio, online and on social media ensured that stories related to the election were easily and constantly accessible. One study showed that 54 percent of adults who used social media during the election were more likely to say the election is a very or somewhat significant source of stress. The news bombarded everyone, but most certainly youth “ the most connected of generations. Stories of harassment and intimidation dominated news coverage after the election. News headlines reported a barrage of painted swastikas and hate speech , minority students being threatened and assaulted and an increased incidence of hate crimes. These events across the country created anxiety about safety, discrimination and inclusivity in schools and on college campuses. What youth are saying In this climate, we wanted to talk to youth about what they were experiencing. Our team collects weekly survey data from people aged 14 to 24 across the nation via text messages. Immediately before and two weeks and four months after the presidential election, 80 youth answered open-ended questions about their emotional and physical responses to the election and the new presidential administration. We learned that the majority of youth were experiencing, and continue to experience, physical or emotional distress in the current political climate. Physical distress “ difficulty concentrating, insomnia and overeating “ was frequently coupled with emotional distress, including depression, anxiety and fear. Youth felt overwhelmed and exhausted throughout the election season. Respondents reported fear of potential discrimination. They felt unsafe and hopeless about their future opportunities. Two weeks after the election, a year-old Indian-American explained her worries: A year-old Muslim-American wrote: News about the election and post-election implications have been hard to escape, leaving many youth feeling just as stressed as before the election. Among adults, studies have found that psychological and physiological changes occur while voting and after an election , particularly when the political conversation is focused on issues that directly impact them. Youth distress matters These responses should be concerning to those of us who work with and care about youth. During this tumultuous time, many of us continue to be exposed to news every day, everywhere we turn. Between and , rates of depression significantly increased for adolescents, from 8. Similar trends have been observed with anxiety disorders. Will feelings of hopelessness persist throughout the current administration? How will youth respond to the midterm elections and primaries? Will widespread fear, anxiety and depression affect the future health and well-being of young people? We encourage those who work with young people “ such as teachers, clinicians and parents “ to see this as a critical opportunity. Now is the time to model positive coping strategies , embrace thoughtful conversation, encourage voting and volunteer work for causes youth care about and perhaps instill a sense of hope through our own actions and words.

Legs swollen from scratching? Welcome to the crowd. The mosquitoes are worse this year. The distribution of invasive Aedes mosquitoes in Southern California, as of Aug. County Vector Control District. And on a hot day in August, LAist went along for the kill. That means the invasive mosquito infestation could get worse in the future, as temperatures rise. Vector control inspectors Yessenia Avilez and Faiza Haider see if they caught a mosquito in the net inside their aspirator. They both wear visors with an embroidered mosquito on the front, and their shiny Vector Control badges. The only thing personalized about their outfits are their tiny sparkly earrings. Avilez and Haider bring a few things to every appointment: Culex prefer to lay their eggs in big sources of water, like swimming pools, but the Aedes mosquitoes hardly need any water at all. Both mosquitoes, however, can carry diseases: Culex has successfully transmitted West Nile to six people in L. The women pick up potted plants, checking to see if the trays underneath are holding stagnant water. They peer into bamboo thickets, looking for places where water collects. They inspect doggy dishes, looking for larvae. And they take out their flashlights to check out empty buckets and pots, looking for the thin white calcium line where water used to be. Faiza Haider with the Greater L. And the eggs can lie dormant for years, just waiting for the pot or bucket to be refilled again. Haider takes out the aspirator and holds it up like a squirt gun, jabbing it towards a mosquito buzzing near the back of the yard. She looks like one of the Ghostbusters. But this time, the little bugger got away. As the women turn to leave, Stephens Rosenthal offers a tip: No one is home. But through the fence they can see, beneath the deck, a giant, uncovered rain barrel. They poke their flashlights through the fence, shining it at the hole. Ideally, the inspectors would treat the rain barrel with larvicide right away. Also, an earlier version of this story referred to "tupperware" used to transport mosquitoes and larvae, since "Tupperware" is a name brand, that reference has been changed to "plastic containers.
