October 17, Education This week, after more than four years of pretrial litigation and sifting through , documents, Students for Fair Admission will get its day in a Massachusetts federal district court on allegations that Harvard University discriminates against Asian-American applicants. The trial is expected to last for at least three weeks. Based on the evidence that SFA presented in pretrial motions, Harvardâ€™s whether it wins or loses in courtâ€™s in for a long, embarrassing slog. Harvard, as a private university, is not subject to constitutional requirements that apply to public universities, but because it accepts federal funding, it is subject to Title VI, the civil rights law that replicates much of the constitutional structure. The law governing affirmative-action practices is a complete mess. Rather, they must first consider whether there is any non-discriminatory means to achieve diversity. Whether it wins or loses, SFA has done a public service by highlighting just how ugly this process can be. The school assigns applicants a rating of 1 to 6, with some files afforded plus or minus ratings to indicate strength or weakness relative to others in that band. On the objective portions of this schemeâ€™s grades and SAT scoresâ€™ Asian-Americans outperform every ethnic group handily. They score nearly as strongly in less objective but still reasonably measurable areas such as extracurricular activities and teacher recommendations. With the alumni, Asian-Americans score as high as any other ethnic group, and much higher than blacks or Hispanics. But among campus-bound officers, who review a paper record, Asian-Americans score far lower on personal ratings than any other racial group. This factor, SFA alleges, depresses the overall ratings of Asian-American applicants and substantially reduces their chances at admission: An Asian-American applicant with a 25 percent chance of admission would have a 35 percent chance if he were white, a 75 percent chance if he were Hispanic, and a 95 percent chance if he were black. The trial will likely shed harsh light on the internal racial sausage-making. One striking piece of evidence is the annual meeting of admissions officers of 17 elite and Ivy League colleges, at which they sit in a room and, one-by-one, read the percentage of admitted students from each of seven racial categories and then discuss without taking notes. Based on academic qualifications alone, it should be 40 percent or more. Lost in the abstract discussion of numbers and trends is the fact that the victimized students are real people, often from disadvantaged backgrounds, with their own legitimate aspirations built on years of sterling academic achievement. The most poignant section of a motion bristling with statistics and regression analysis is an excerpt of deposition testimony from a college admissions counselor at Stuyvesant High School in New York City. Seventy percent of Stuyvesant students are Asian-American, and Harvard admits at least ten Stuyvesant students per year, though less than half of that group is Asian-American, generally. Have you ever seen statistics like this before? Do you think that something likeâ€™s do you think that discrepancies that big couldâ€™s Sorryâ€™s A. Would you like to take a break? Witness shakes her head no. You want to keep going? You want to tell me why this is upsetting to you? And these just look like numbers to all of you guys, but I see their faces. Affirmative-action proponents recognize the profound challenge that this case poses to the tottering edifice of the policy: Expect to see this case coming to the Supreme Court in a future term. The views expressed here are his own.
