Interviewing people and searching through period newspapers, diaries, letters, books, and magazines in an attempt to capture the character of another time is both a challenge and an adventure. Readers will be able to put a human face to terms such as scab labor and being blacklisted. Clandestine union meetings, and fellow workers and neighbors paid to spy on behalf of the Oliver Iron Mining Corporation, add intrigue to a tale of immigrant dreams and harsh realities in a new country. Mostly, though, this is a story of human resilience and hope for the future. Summary Fifteen-year-old Otto Peltonen, with his mother and two sisters, leaves his home in Finland to join his father already working in the iron mines of Minnesota. It is May of , and the two-week crossing is wretched, with seasick passengers crowded into steerage, "the lowest compartment of the ship. After a joyful reunion in Duluth and a short train ride to Hibbing, reality sets in. Dust from the mine covers everything, and mosquitoes swarm through the cracks in the walls. He dreams of earning enough money to buy a farm and move his family out of Finn Town. Otto becomes friends with Kaarlo Nikko Nikkola, and together they go fishing and explore the town. Nikko introduces Otto to his wonderful collection of books and lets him borrow them any time he wants. Otto begins school, but decides to drop out after a year and work in the mine in order to help save money for the farm. When the Union submits just three demands to the mining company, the company fires workers. The miners strike, but with few supporters, they gain nothing. The company hires replacement workers, and things get violent. Many Finns are blacklisted and forced to leave town. Fortunately, Father has found a farm to buy and with the money he and Otto have saved is able to pay the down payment. With the extra money Father has earned from woodworking, they buy a cow, tools, and a plow and get ready to move. Their dream of oma tupa, oma lupa has become a reality.
