January 29, By: She assured me his hair is fine. She also assured me his hair is fine. And I also think his hair is fine. I hate clothes shopping and I always have. I quit dying my hair and embraced the gray at age My mother has been prodding me to put on some lipstick for three decades. You have to have a thick skin to be a blogger “ especially if you occasionally blog about topics which elicit strong opinions “ and my skin is alligator thick by now. Because I know that appearance matters. Call it personal image, perception, first impression, or whatever you want, but the reality is that we are all judged “ at least initially “ by how we look. When my gray hair first began to show, in my twenties, after being blonde my whole life, I opted to color my hair red for awhile. As the parent of two children with visible disabilities, I have seen the same dynamic play out, particularly with Sarah Kate, because she often blends in with the crowd at first glance, but eventually people notice her disability. I was always fond of him and, as an adult, I have always been a bit pleased with myself that I was kind and friendly to him when I was a shamelessly self-absorbed adolescent. Pleased might not even be the best word “ relieved is probably a better one, because how awful the guilt would be today if I had not been kind, now that I have a son of my own with intellectual disability yes, it pains me to reveal the depth of my shallowness to you. But it occurred to me recently, after reading this post , that maybe the way I treated him had much less to do with me and much more to do with him. As far back as I can remember, he was always neat and fashionable “ nothing too trendy, just khakis, colorful golf shirts, a good haircut, and so on. He looked like he fit in. Conformity is highly overrated. Because of their disabilities, my children will never perfectly fit into a society that is not built for them, and, knowing that, I want them to embrace their unique and original selves. In a perfect world, that would be enough. But I also know that they must deal with the world not as we hope it will one day be, but as it is right here, right now. But for now, his hair stays. Has the way someone looked ever influenced your actions “ particularly in a way you learned later may not have been accurate to the situation? Subscribe for email updates.
