In the third installment of our conversation with Mullins, the London Business School professor describes the leaps of faith new ventures need to take in order to get off the ground. What are some famous leaps of faith that we take for granted now, because they came true? An example of that for Apple was the leap of faith that consumers would actually pay for some of the music they would put on their iPods. Steve Jobs thought that people would pay something for some portion of their music. The question was "How much will they pay for a song? His leap of faith was that they would pay 99 cents a song. But the only way to test that was to launch the full iTunes store and see if anyone bought. They had a pretty nice first day: Do you have any examples where the leaps of faith an entrepreneur made were totally wrong, but the company was still able to recover and prosper? The first of these he called the "big bazaar"; these were Wal-Mart-like general merchandise stores at a time when there were not stores like this in India. Virtually all retailing was through unorganized small mom-and-pop shops. His leap of faith was that you could take the Wal-Mart model and just transplant it and copy it in India. Nice neat rows of merchandise, carefully ordered, very strong supply chain on the back end, and so on. What he found was that all of the back end stuff about having direct relationships with suppliers and other logistical elements all translated really well. He said the stores were too well organized; customers would walk through the store and never stop Today his company is the largest retailer in India. Your book tells us that in order to check if they are progressing in the right areas, entrepreneurs should have a "dashboard. You find these used in big companies all the time. Good firms know "what gets measured, gets done. Our notion of a dashboard is really turning that idea upside down. You have to learn by testing your leaps of faith. We suggest that people build a dashboard rather than losing blood, sweat, and tears blindly executing some business plan. You have to go out and test and record the data you get back. This is a guide for your journey, not just a tracking device. Instead of trying to keep a company on course, our goal is to figure out how we need to change course.
