

Chapter 1 : Lonely Planet Best in Travel Any Love for Croatia?

Croatia's extraordinary island-speckled coastline is indisputably its main attraction. The first thing that strikes you is the remarkable clarity of the water. When it's set against a dazzling white pebbly beach, the water sparkles with a jewel-like intensity in shades of emerald and sapphire.

By Nikolina Demark , 25 Oct , Lonely Planet came out with their annual selection of best travel destinations earlier this week. Can you guess which Croatian tourist hotspot made the list? As part of their Best in Travel feature, the renowned travel guide published four themed lists in total: Among the 40 items in total, some of the choices come as no surprise: Portugal and China, Seville and Oslo. Some are a bit more unexpected, such as Detroit or the Aeolian islands in Italy. Where Croatia is considered, which particular destination do you think made the cut? Not Dubrovnik, not Split, not Plitvice, not Istria. But you know what? That might not be such a bad thing. Take the coastal cities and the islands, for example. Multiple Adriatic gems made international headlines throughout the season – a season that broke every tourist record previously set in Croatia. The Telegraph featured a detailed guide to the Pearl of the Adriatic as well. The list goes on and on: Hvar remains the overlord of the Croatian island empire – the media simultaneously swoons over its beauty and debates about the unfortunate party tourism business. All that mass media love for Croatia is more than welcome, but what about the other side of the coin? Owing to the public attention in general and the Game of Thrones frenzy, the Old Town in Dubrovnik has been bursting at the seams for quite some time now, coming to a point where we all started to wonder whether such an immense number of visitors is actually favourable for a certain destination – or the Croatian Adriatic as a whole. It might be time for the state to start supporting those regions that have a lot of potential, but only need a bit of help to thrive. All things considered, until we all start working together to put the overlooked parts of the country in the international spotlight, Croatia not getting featured on a popular list of best travel destinations makes for a well-deserved break.
