Maya Banks is the #1 USA Today and #1 New York Times bestselling author of the Surrender trilogy, the Breathless trilogy, the Sweet series, the Colters' Legacy novels, and The Enforcers series.

April 2, Paperback: Bethany will be his and his alone. Even if it means turning his back on his best friend. Jace Crestwell is still trying to get used to his baby sister, Mia, being engaged to one of his best friends and partner, Gabe Hamilton. Jace and Ash have been sharing women for several years now. Bethany is as intrigued by Jace as he is with her, and if she has to sleep with both men to spend the night with him, so be it. But the whole thing feels off to Jace from the beginning. He wants Bethany all to himself. When she disappears the next day, Jace is frantic to find her again. Worse is knowing that his friend has touched the one woman who has Jace in a possessive frenzy and it is putting a strain on their decades long friendship. I like the way Maya Banks writes her characters. They are very passionate and well developed. Although I generally liked the story and it was a quick read, I was uncomfortable with the opening scene with Jace, Ash and Bethany because Jace was so uncomfortable with what was happening. In this story, Jace has some great moments but just as many when he was an ass. Every time he was in a bad mood, he jumped all over her for something or other and then spends a good deal of time terrified she will leave and then trying to console her for treating her badly. I understood that Bethany was relieved after all her life being ignored or abused and fighting to survive, that she would enjoy having someone like Jace taking care of her and making decision for her. That annoyed me and if I thought too much about it, it left me feeling like Jace was just taking advantage of a homeless woman with no where else to go. With the exception of my personal annoyance at Bethany, it was a good story and I am looking forward to see what Maya has planned for Ash. Received an ARC from netgalley. Kate said Bethany was injured and his mind was filled with images, none that were good. Jace had been too impatient to get to her. How the hell had she gotten hurt? When his car pulled up in front of the shelter, he directed his driver to wait. He strode toward the entrance, the wind biting through his coat. When he opened the door, his gaze immediately swept the room, searching out Bethany. Then, finally, he saw her. Off to one side. Away from the others. She was sitting in a chair, pale and looking lost. Still, he drank in the sight of her, relieved beyond words that she was here. He could see that her pants were torn at the knees and on one side. He could also see the bloodstains on her clothing and the raw scrapes on her elbows. What the ever-loving hell? Before he could start over, Kate stepped in front of him, her face creased with worry. I worry about her. About all of them. Look around you, Mr. All these woman have a warm place to sleep and food to eat because of you. He nodded briefly and then headed for Bethany. Her eyes were closed. She looked asleep sitting up. He took the opportunity to study her more closely and he swore at what he saw. She looked even thinner if possible. There were shadows under the eyes. And she was hurting. He knelt quietly in front of her. As soon as she sensed his presence, her eyes flew open and she flinched away, panic firing in her eyes. Her eyes widened and he was gratified to see that her fear disappeared, but it was quickly replaced by confusion. Then she straightened and she turned her hands inward, hiding the scrapes and the blood. His expression hardened and he stood. Her gaze followed him up and without saying anything, he simply reached down and plucked her slight weight from the chair. She landed softly against his chest and he cradled her possessively, determined that nothing else would hurt her. Then she stiffened and her mouth fell open with a gasp. He strode toward the door, he grip tightening when she began to struggle. He nodded to reassure the older woman and then he tightened his hold on her further. Do you want to frighten all the women? Slowly she shook her head.

Chapter 3 : Maya Banks - Wikipedia

And, well, Gabe moved fast when he wanted something, if nothing else. It was pretty funny for Jace to see his friend in knots over a woman. Her entire face lit up. I already made that clear. You made him work for it. I gotta admire that. Then he shook his head. For both you and me? You would have had a mother figure instead of being stuck with an overbearing, overprotective brother as your sole source of support. She was aglow with happiness over her impending marriage to Gabe, and now she wanted everyone she cared about wrapped up in that same glow. He and Ash should probably be ducking and running. Mia frowned and cocked her head upward. The three of us, Gabe, me and Ash. Only you changed the game for Gabe. I want him to treat you right. I want you to remember it forever. Jace retreated to the far side of the room and stood back, observing the goings-on at the party. It was small—what Gabe and Mia wanted—a night to celebrate their love. It sounded corny as hell, but then one only had to look at the two to know they were complete goners. He needed bleach for his eyes because there were just some things a brother never, ever needed to see regarding his baby sister. He still had concerns over whether Mia really knew what the hell she was getting herself into, but Gabe was a complete mush pile when it came to her. Hell, the man had humbled himself in front of half of New York City to get her back, so Jace guessed Mia would be able to handle whatever Gabe dished out. Jace was just going to not think about it. He sighed as his gaze wandered over the crowd and the festive environment. Mia had been a huge part of his life ever since their parents had been killed in a car accident. Gabe and Ash had both been a huge source of support for him and perhaps in a lot of ways Mia had cemented their friendship. Not that he planned to go anywhere, but things were different now. It should be a relief, but instead sadness settled into his chest at the idea that his baby sister no longer needed him as she once had. His gaze settled on a young woman picking up glasses and plates from the tables. She was dressed in black pants, a white shirt and an apron. He studied her a long moment before realizing what it was that had interested him. She looked completely out of place. The longer he stared at her, the more he thought she looked like she should be an attendee at the party. Not cleaning up after the participants. Midnight black, unruly curls, some of which had escaped the clip and tumbled down her neck. She was slight, not as curvy as he usually liked his women. The rest of her was small. When she turned, presenting him with a view of her face, he sucked in his breath. Her bone structure was small. High, prominent cheekbones, almost as if she were underweight, and a small chin. They were enormous in her otherwise small face. A brilliant shade of blue. Shock blue, like looking at ice. They were startling against the jet black of her hair. His gaze followed her across the room until she disappeared through the door for the kitchen staff. Jace broke from his reverie and turned to see that Ash had already finished his dance with Mia. A brief look toward the dance floor told him Gabe had reclaimed Mia and that the two were once more solidly glued together. She was in good hands. And she was happy. Saw you checking her out. Hell, you were practically undressing her with your eyes. But Ash had already sauntered away in the direction of the kitchen, leaving Jace standing there, fingers in tight fists at his sides. The best part of this gig—besides the fact it was cash paying—was the food. She was allowed to take leftovers, and judging by the amount of food bustling in and out of this place, there was going to be plenty. Rich people always did things in excess. There was no way the number of people invited to this party justified the amount of food and booze being fronted. A wave of sadness engulfed her and just as quickly, guilt. She had no business feeling this way because Jack had come back around. Disappeared for days and then reappeared, usually when he needed a place to crash, a friendly face. Her chest squeezed because she knew what he did with the money he asked for even as he hated to do so. He never looked her in the eye. Not by blood but in every way else it counted. He was hers just like she was his. How was she supposed to ever turn her back on him? There was a sound at the side door, the one that opened to the alley where the trash was taken out. She glanced up to see Jack leaning against the frame, his head tilted back so he could glance down the alleyway. Always one eye on escape. He never went into any situation unwary and without his escape route planned.

Half when she went off duty for the night. Jack would get this half. Hurrying to where he stood, she pressed the bills into his hand and watched uncomfortably as his gaze skated sideways, not making eye contact with her as he shoved the money into the ripped, torn jeans. His stance was uncomfortable. She knew he hated this. She hated it too.
