Second episode broadcast (Sept 19), "Monkey See, Monkey Die," was a great improvement over the first, though the starry-eyed 'Davy's in Love' routine has already grown tiresome.

Background[edit] The other disputed image, a full-body "selfie" Since , British nature photographer David Slater had traveled to Indonesia to take photographs of the critically endangered Celebes crested macaques. In he licensed several images to the Caters News Agency who released them, along with a written promotional press release with quotes from Slater, for publication in the British media. They were too nervous so I had to get them [the monkeys] to come to the camera without me being there and get them to play with the release, which they did". The session ended when the "dominant male at times became over excited and eventually gave me a whack with his hand as he bounced off my back". Initially, an administrator at Commons removed the images, but they were later restored after a community discussion on their copyright nature. Slater continued to challenge the Foundation to remove the image. Techdirt posted the photograph with a public domain license, arguing that the photograph was in the public domain because the monkey was not a legal person capable of holding a copyright, and Slater could not hold copyright to the photo because he was not involved in its creation. I set the camera up on a tripod, framed [the shot] up and got the exposure right I had one hand on the tripod when this was going on, but I was being prodded and poked by would be groomers and a few playful juveniles who nibbled at my arms" [15] In a November interview with the radio show This American Life , Slater said that he was holding the tripod with his fingers when the images were taken. Luria and Charles Swan said that because the creator of the photograph is an animal and not a person, there is no copyright on the photograph, regardless of who owns the equipment with which the photograph was created. The Office will not register works produced by nature, animals, or plants. She said that the US Copyright Office was clarifying existing practice, and not creating a new policy. However the question as to whether the photographer owns copyright is more complex. It depends on whether the photographer has made a creative contribution to the work and this is a decision which must be made by the courts. Reaction to these selfies and to pre-printed monkey posters was mixed. David Slater[edit] The macaque photographs appeared in a book titled "Wildlife Personalities" that Slater had published via San Francisco-based self-publishing company Blurb, Inc. The Competitive Enterprise Institute filed an amicus brief on 13 September , urging the court to deny vacatur. The brief argues, that since Naruto is not a party to the settlement, PETA does not have standing to move for vacatur. The judges noted that their decision had to be considered in light of Cetacean Community v. Bush, a case heard by the Ninth Circuit that found, under some circumstances, animals could have some standing to seek legal action, and encourages that the Ninth Circuit should hold an en banc hearing to review their decision in Cetacean in light of the monkey selfie case. The Circuit Court requested the parties to provide briefs within 21 days on whether the en banc hearing should be granted [49] [50] and on August 31, declined to review the case. After it went on Wikipedia all interest in buying it went. By July , Slater was reported to be broke and unable to pay his attorney. It would pay peanuts, but at least it would be more than photography. I am just not motivated to go out and take photos any more. No one had heard of these monkeys six years ago, they were down to the last thousands. Tourists are now visiting and people see there is a longer-term benefit to the community than just shooting a monkey. The project is being overseen by Dawn Ostroff and Jeremy Steckler.

Yes, this post is about knitting. I have been working on this new pattern for a lotus-shaped bag. When the first sample was knit up, inside out, I realized it looked like some horrifying giant squid or other denizen of the deep (or Cthulhu, for that matter).
