Grandview-Woodland community plan Neighbourhood history and heritage The proximity to the business district of Vancouver and the availability of a quality water supply Brewery Creek made the area an ideal place for early industry and settlement. Edmonds, clerk of the municipal council in New Westminster, was the original owner of much of Mount Pleasant. History By , Mount Pleasant was home to a tannery, two slaughter houses, four breweries, and a train station. Industrial expansion brought residential development. Mount Pleasant was also a terminus for the streetcar network. By , the character of the community was already established with block after block of houses on small lots, and a mix of residential and industrial uses. The s brought changes to Mount Pleasant. Industrial expansion north of Broadway between Main and Cambie Streets resulted in the demolition of many homes. These changes transformed Mount Pleasant and it began to lose its residential prestige. Throughout the s and s the remaining houses in the industrial area disappeared and more industries, low-rise offices and warehouses moved in. In , the city expropriated park land at 12th Avenue and Cambie Street to build a new city hall. Mayor McGeer felt that the new location would link the area to the rest of the city. Davis Today many older homes in south and west parts of Mount Pleasant have been restored.
