OtherHand Casa Morena, the Chaco Canyon outlier that never was There are a lot of interesting things to be found in the desert if one is clever in the search. Part of that is looking for unusual items on maps, especially older maps. You know, weird shit. These include USGS topos, as well as commonly used street atlases of the state. Now this is certainly the middle of nowhere, perhaps even downtown nowhere. This was interesting, as I had never seen any mention of outliers in this area. What was this place? Examination of the area in Google Earth showed nothing obvious to be found, or at least from a high aerial viewpoint. This mystery site was not among them. This could be fun. Uh, that was a pain. Getting the precise syntax just right was tricky, but eventually I came across the initial Presidential proclamation that created Chaco Canyon National Monument in Map of Presidential proclamation. Casa Moreno is still there. An ancient pueblo ruin of considerable importance, situated near the top of the continental divide in NW New Mexico. It is usually assigned to the Chaco Canyon group, but this is assumed without evidence except as to outward appearance. No excavations have been made and the ruin has not been described. It is built of sandstone after the manner of the Chaco canyon pueblos. It is in the midst of the desert, far from water, and not near any of the main trails. Hewett, inf n, Navaho name. This tract was set aside by the proclamation of This tract, which is privately owned, does not contain any archeological remains and should be deleted. It was removed from the park by Public Law , passed by the Congress on December 19, A little more searching turned up the ultimate and detailed answer. It seems that in when Special Agent Holsinger recommended that certain Chaco ruins be embraced in a proposed federal preserve, he included a site called Casa Morena, described as similar to Kin Ya-a though larger and in more ruinous condition. Holsinger gave a legal description of its location which placed it about eleven miles east of Crownpoint. Congress withdrew the land and included it with those set aside for Chaco Canyon National Monument. However, when the National Park Service found time to pay attention to the sites in the detached areas outside the main canyon and its immediate environs, they could not find Casa Morena, even though New Mexico state maps as late as the s located it a short distance southeast of Pueblo Bonito. A review of the circumstances makes it clear that Holsinger had not visited the site but, while in Thoreau awaiting the train for his return to Phoenix, had been told about a ruin whose name he interpreted as Casa Morena. Based on that conversation, he assumed it to be another of the large, isolated Chaco settlements, and in so doing, caused perplexed government officials years of trouble. Since it never has been located, it appears likely that the site is one presently known as Casamero, a medium-sized Chaco-type complex named for a local nineteenth-century Navajo headman. Although not in the exact location given by Holsinger, it is in its general vicinity and fits his description. Casamero, it turns out, is on Bureau of Land Management lands, not within the national monument. The Listers nailed it. It saved me a long trip to nowhere and killed an afternoon of research. If only they all were this easy. Hold onâ€¦wait just a minuteâ€¦!. Maybe this is what the man wants us to believe??! What if there were in fact spectacular ruins there? This makes for a perfect cover story!
