But in her world, the heroine always found a way to overcome dire straits. Similar happy endings were in store for the protagonists of "Valley of the Vapours," "For Bitter or Worse" and the nearly other books she wrote. Dailey eventually admitted to the infractions and lost her big-name publisher. But she kept on writing, and many of her fans stuck by her. And then she went on. Although he declined to give an exact cause of death, Tweedy said it was "health reasons. By then, she and her husband, Bill â€” who she said was the model for the rugged men in her books â€” had taken early retirement and were traveling the country in a Silver Streak trailer. In a Washington Post interview, she claimed to be able to write a novel in 16 days. Dailey wrote several themed series of books, including her "Americana" series of 50 novels with one set in each state. Her devotion to U. Indeed, Dailey was the first U. After attending secretarial school in Omaha she went to work for a construction company owned by Bill Dailey. They eventually married and he became the main researcher for her books that were steeped in history. A Times review said the tome marked a move by Dailey "to shed the romance cloak, although there are enough beautiful heroines and handsome heroes falling in love or at least lust at first sight to keep longtime fans satisfied. Other suspect passages were found. Dailey issued a statement, saying that the similarities "were there and had to be admitted. She also said the "essentially random and non-pervasive acts of copying are attributable to a psychological problem that I never even suspected I had," and that she was in treatment for the unnamed "disorder. The author skipped the Romance Writers of America convention and generally laid low in Branson, where the Daileys had lived since In , Kensington Publishing starting bringing out her new books, beginning with "A Capital Holiday. A promotional synopsis says that the heroine of the book comes to realize "that the best gifts are second chances, happy endings, and the kind of love that makes every day warm and bright. She is survived by stepson Jim Dailey, stepdaughter Linda Scheibe, three sisters, four grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.
