Home PhD thesis guidelines PhD thesis guidelines This document aims to gather some hints and suggestions to effectively write a PhD dissertation in economics. It does not pretend to be a complete treaty. Rather, it delivers some effective guidelines. The list of the topics include: The principal task of a PhD program is to introduce a candidate to the research activity. Doing research means making discoveries: Progress may involve either small steps or a big jump. Both are valuable contributions and can produce an effective thesis. A PhD candidate needs to develop a new idea and add something original to the existing knowledge background. The first step to achieving this outcome is to formulate original, precise, and clear questions. In this respect, a thesis must have a central question to be addressed, and the different contributions usually three papers should relate to this topic. A precise motivation and a clear question are the true backbone of any dissertation. But prior to this, in your motivation letter you must deliver a brief description of your proposal in which you explain the topic and the methodology you intend to use. The research plan is a basic requirement in order to be enrolled in the PhD program. This document is due in the three months after acceptance. Your thesis proposal must include the following two basic features: Ideally, your research plan should include: The title of the thesis An introduction in which you put forward the key question and the objectives of the research A brief overview of the current state of your selected topic The methodology of the research A short description of at least three research chapters in which you bring new ideas or insights about current open questions A timescale planning of the planned advances in your research Information about your sources of financing As for the content of your research, make an effort to: Consider that a PhD thesis needs to build around at least three publishable papers. Let us focus on the model of the conventional three-paper thesis though other formats are allowed provided they contain at least three publishable contributions. This model involves a clear commitment in terms of quality because candidates must prove they are able to produce three potentially publishable contributions. The classic structure includes the following elements: This means that the chapters can be read and understood independently, but each one is tied to your central questions. For each of the three chapters you need to include a short introduction detailing the content, aim, and novelty of the contribution. The methodology must have the standards of papers published in scientific journals. This includes a variety of possible methodologies: In particular, the methodology is not restricted to econometrics although our programme prepares well for this methodology, as you can also make use of any other widely used techniques in your field of research. Theoretically-oriented theses in the research fields covered by the members of the Department are also acceptable. What is most important is that the paper includes three publishable in scientific journals contributions, that is, something that has not been done before. A literature survey is not usually considered a contribution, although the thesis including its introduction should signal an excellent knowledge of the relevant literature. In order to provide further elements to better demonstrate the quality of your work, you may add appendices that gather all the technicalities that are not suitable for inclusion into the main text of the dissertation. Even if it is hard to schedule proper research activity, it is possible to fix some general milestones. For a three-year full-time PhD candidate, the following general schedule is suggested: Of course, in order to keep this ideal schedule, remember there will be times where you are required to work on more than one paper at once.
