You loved something or someone deeply, intensely. It was a part of your world, a part of your heart, so much a part of your daily life that you sort of forgot how special it was. You forgot to appreciate it. You forgot to be grateful for it. And then, one day, it was gone. Maybe it was a loved one. Someone who was central to your life, gone forever, whom you wished so hard you could see just one more time. Or maybe it was a place. A town that grew and changed, a home you lived in that has since been destroyed. The home town is never the same. The show that you loved came to an end. The memories live on only in memory. At least, that was its destiny until it returned. January 24, , was a red-letter date on my calendar. Marked with a giant X: Giddy I was, downright giddy with anticipation. So January 24 came along, and at 7 p. It was unbearable, but it finally ended. The more or less original opening filled the screen, and my grin spread from ear to ear. I grinned through the whole show, joy in my heart, elation in my soul. When the first episode was over, I posted on Facebook: Ours is a critical society. I am sure there were people waiting with bated breath, hands at keyboards, ready to pounce. To find the slightest imperfections, the smallest inconsistencies, the littlest confirmations of a pre-decided opinion: When something you once loved, that you thought was gone forever, comes back, you have to savor every episode, every line, every look, every nod to the past, every moment. Was it what I expected? If your life today is what you thought it would be. I feel pretty confident there are no hands raised. Life takes us places we never expected. Living your path, each tiny choice leads to the next, moment to moment. It makes sense because we witness it as it unfolds. But reviving a TV show means making all those choices at once. Was the path they picked the one I would have picked? But who they are is, nonetheless, believable. The struggles and the wondering: Should I have taken another path? These are questions we all grapple with in our own real lives. Which makes it feel real. Sure, there are the deviations from the original story, accompanied by unspoken requests from the creators that we play along. But I saw Cigarette Smoking Man die. Like, not just sort of die, not just maybe die. He was decimated, eviscerated, destroyed in a fiery ball of very hot fiery fire. You want to bring him back? I want to believe. For you, Chris Carter, I will believe. Did Julie Andrews not remind us that nothing lasts forever; nothing ever could? Critics can go on criticizing, tearing apart whatever there is to tear apart, judging mercilessly while occasionally deeming a moment or two worthy of praise. Are the things you remember the same things I remember? Are the things that were important to me the same things that were important to you? How have you changed? Will I recognize you? Will you still love me? Will I still love you? Nothing lasts forever; nothing ever could. I loved it in its original day, and I love it now. Turns out the good shows stick with you, the characters and the actors who played them, and the people who created it all stay in your heart. Even after all this time?
