Currently, the manufacturer of the Pinnacle system, has been found liable for hundreds of millions of dollars in damages to patients who endured difficulties after their implantation. The Pinnacle system was found to have both design and production defects, leading to the failure. Metal-on-metal hip replacement systems utilize a metal ball and joint, rather than a plastic or ceramic joint. However, these systems failed at a unusually high rate, necessitating revision surgery or surgeries and causing other problems, such as discomfort at the implantation site. The NIH study discovered that the cobalt and chromium shavings were having psychological health effects on the patients: However, the researchers figured out that there was more at play: If the latter is the case it might have major, as yet unrecognised, implications for public health and wellbeing. In the meantime, to preserve neurocognitive function implant removal conceivably should be as quickly as possible after toxicity is identified. This has some relevance to product liability litigation worldwide. However we believe that any commercial factors should be set aside in the interest of public safety and the bioethical principle of social justice. The researchers reduced their patient list to 10 patients whose systems had failed. They found out that prior to revision surgery, nine of the 10 were suffering from harmful amounts of chromium and cobalt in their blood. Seven of the nine exhibited short-term memory loss. Other psychological problems seen in the patients included confusion, problems with tests of focus and word finding troubles. Metal-on-metal hip replacement systems use a metallic ball and joint system, as opposed to other hip replacement systems which use ceramic components. The metal-on-metal systems fail at a greater rate than other kinds of systems. The failures result in joint pain and blood loss in the hip area and can result in metallosis, an issue that happens when metals get into the blood. Most of the metal-on-metal system failures cause corrective surgery. Hip replacement surgeries have increased in recent years, with upward of , such surgeries being performed in the USA annually. The condition referred to as osteoarthritis is a leading cause of hip failure. The purpose of the trials is to assist the trial judge determine if similar cases should go forward and provide the defendants a sense of their future liability. The defendants won one trial, but plaintiffs have won the last three - two in Texas and one in California. Those two heavy metals have been linked to both dementia and heart disease. Other systems use ceramics, plastics or other materials. The problems associated with metal-on-metal hip replacement systems stem from wear on the joint. That wear may cause the system to fail entirely at much higher rates than hip replacement systems made of other materials, which leads to surgery to fix the system. Additionally, the metal shavings can lead to irritation at the implant site and to the metals entering the blood system, a condition known as metallosis. Hip replacement surgeries have become popular in the United States, with surgeons performing upward of , such operations each year. Testimony in trials in the United States and abroad has revealed that the Pinnacle systems were not correctly manufactured and that a design flaw led to a higher-than-normal failure rate.
