Provides a critique of reason, demanding that we take greater responsibility for nature and other people. Before the Voice of Reason is a phenomenological critique of reason grounded in our experience of the voices that already address us and summon us prior to the emergence of the voice of reason.

Army Colonel Christopher Kolenda, who fought in Afghanistan and later served as a senior Pentagon adviser, was instrumental in helping set up those talks — in part through his own discussion with Taliban officials in Qatar. This interview was condensed for clarity. How would you characterize the current U.S. effort for a conversation between the U.S. and the Taliban? Because only Afghans can solve that. Is there any indication these talks have moved into more advanced stages? Not to my knowledge. It seems there was a discussion and then things are on hold a bit. From your discussions, which included former U.S. Ambassador Robin Raphel, what do you sense the Taliban wants? Well, the bottom line is they want an end to the occupation. And once the occupation is finished, then they say they can begin to have negotiations with the Afghan government on a political settlement. Your discussions were with the Taliban political commission in Qatar. Do you sense that this office actually has the authority to negotiate these things? And the Taliban, for their part, have been very consistent that their political representatives in Doha are the people they have designated to engage in these talks and to engage with international actors. They are there as people who represent the point of view of the senior leadership. Certainly, as in any organization, there are certain divisions. So through my engagement on these issues, I am fairly well convinced that the political office is who they say they are. There were reports that during your talks with the Taliban that they expressed an openness to a continued U.S. presence. What can you tell us about that? Do you think this is something the U.S. should consider? I mean, I love Afghanistan. An Afghan family, who have escaped from the volatile Ghazni province, stop at a checkpoint in Maidan Shar, west of Kabul, Aug. Is that because the Taliban are fighting to improve their bargaining position? And they are not in a position to be forced to sue for peace while they have the current levels of local and international support that they enjoy. There are other motivations as well, including their worry about Afghanistan becoming the next Syria. But probably more so for the Taliban. For a lot of people who follow Afghanistan, I think we get tired sometimes of every development, whether good or bad, being interpreted as progress. There has been remarkable progress in Afghanistan in many, many respects. People talk a lot about the economic progress and political formation and raising the Afghan security forces. And those are all tremendous. The Taliban seem to sense they have to keep pace with these social changes and expectations in order to remain relevant. When you look at the battlefield, certainly since the end of the Obama administration, the Taliban have made major gains. And you have situations like Ghazni where they prove they can surround a major city and conduct major operations into it. Another reason why talks are very important: Now all of this needs to be tested, of course. But it suggests that each party is willing to recognize some of the major war aims of the other.
