

Chapter 1 : The Top 10 Things to Do Near Restaurante Rendezvous, Peguera

Part of an action/adventure trilogy, Ian Feldman's Rendezvous In Majorca is a novel of spies, suspense, and nuclear technology, drawn heavily from the author's background as an officer in the US Army, and his English Grandmother's tales as a double agent for Scotland Yard. In Rendezvous In Majorca.

Our first stop was at Palma de Mallorca, on the island of Majorca not too far from the Spanish coast. Since we only had a half day to see Palma, my family and I opted for the panoramic tour provided by our cruise line. We boarded the coach in the afternoon, and proceeded to head out to the Bellver Castle, a 14th-century structure perched on top of a hill overlooking the beaches. Following our short, scenic photo opportunity, we took the coach for a minute drive to Valldemossa, a village located north of Palma which is situated on top of a hill and a beauty to look at from the distance. While driving over to Valldemossa, we passed through the countryside, where we saw fields of olive and fig trees. Considering that our time in Italy had been nothing but sunny weather, it was expected that the winter skies would come eventually—and it arrived during our time in Majorca. We reached Valldemossa, and we were first taken to a small cafe where we were treated to Spanish hot chocolate. Our time in the cafe was brief, as we moved on to wander the narrow, cobblestone roads of the village. There were plenty of potted plants along the buildings, which made the streets even more charming—the occasional bursts of red and violet along the neutral-colored walls made for pretty photos to be taken. The cloister and gardens surrounding it were surprisingly green, even in the dead of winter. We did a short tour around the gardens before heading out back to the coach. Before returning to Palma, we stopped by a vantage point for views of the Mediterranean Sea. If Douglas is willing to lower to a reasonable price, then I might negotiate for it—Views of the Mediterranean. Boarding the coach once more, we head all the way back to Palma—by the time we arrived, it was starting to get a bit late, as our cruise ship would be departing around Unfortunately, we had to rush a bit, as our tour guide took us quickly through the city center, where we saw the mini-version of Las Ramblas like in Barcelona and stopped for a quick photo opportunity of the Palma Cathedral and the coastline at sea level. We returned to our ship on-time, and soon after we set sail for our next destination—just before leaving, we got incredible views of the cathedral lit up in the evening oh, the merits of the sun setting early in the winter! Palma Cathedral in the evening. Overall, our time in Palma was short and, while I found it a bit rushed, it was pleasant to have seen a bit of the city, especially the historic parts. In any case, our taste of the Spanish island was enjoyable, as we moved on to our next stop in Spain. Final post on my December trip to come soon.
