Jun 11, Presidential Elections. Inside Obama's secret meetings with contenders. Still the reluctant leader of the Democratic Party, Obama has been providing counsel to Bernie Sanders.

Click to email this to a friend Opens in new window Ah, a new U. The whispers of change have been flowing for over two years. The rumor that the Secret Service was going to officially add a very specific AR platform rifle to its inventory has been fuel for Internet discussion for some time. All the questions were recently put to rest, however, as the Secret Service officially released a Special Bidding Notice for a new rifle last week. The plan is to go with a weapon firing a rifle caliber round and, in turn, provide better ballistics. This will be a big change. The company that ultimately wins this contract will not only have a feather in its cap, but a decent increase in its bank account as well. It can be no heavier than 7. It must also have a 10 to inch barrel and an overall length not to exceed 34 inches with stock fully extended. The rifle can either be a direct impingement system or a piston gun. The controls need to be ambidextrous with the standard rotary fire selector. The Secret Service lists a two-stage trigger with a pull of between 4 to 6. There is a link to the bidding notice below if you would like to read the nitty gritty details. The gun uses a short-stroke pushrod system that reduces carbon fouling, excessive heat and unburned powder in the action. It has an adjustable gas valve to allow operators to increase the flow of gas when using lower pressure ammunition or when adverse conditions require additional energy. Reduced flow and the off-position enhance the use of suppressors. Sig Sauer is no rookie when it comes to working in the federal procurement world. It will be interesting to see what they ultimately submit. I believe they will offer up the HK A5 with the inch barrel. This gun is obviously a version of the well-known and will certainly be a contender. While not listed in the request, it is certainly a plus. With that as a base, it would make sense that they would submit the same gun for the larger contract. Configured as an SBR, the gun features an Coming in at only 6. Daniel Defense Next on the list is, of course, Daniel Defense. This is a direct impingement gas gun and comes in at a very small It also weighs only 5. The gun and parts have been used in some pretty serious circles. A resume like that warrants the utmost seriousness come submission time. This is a bit of a unicorn gun in that it is not widely known. It is not even on the FN website at this time. As with several others on this list, FN has an established ability to navigate the red tape associated with such a project. Final Thoughts The competition for the contract will be fierce and honestly fun to watch. Any time an agency puts out a such a request, it is serious business cough, Army, cough. With the Secret Service though, it takes on an even more serious tone. Secret Service has a zero-fail mission criterion. To say that they will be finicky about the gun they choose is an understatement. A contract of this size will motivate many people to start getting a gun ready. The challenge will be time and ability to fill the contract. There is always a chance that a dark horse will come out of the field and take home the prize. Regardless, we will certainly get to see some of the best of the best go head-to-head. Milley discussed readiness and modernization efforts during
