Excellent choice - great game and a great table. Fear not, for here are some tips my friends and I have been toying with to make the game run smooth. Open the toolbar at the top of the screen 1 and click on the page settings 2. Shadowrun uses the metric system, so set the scale to 1m. You can set the grid, fog of war and dynamic lighting to suit your preferences. Setting up the page in this way means that people can use the measurement tool easily figure out things like weapon ranges and how far a character can move without sprinting. I like to setup a title page with the character tokens and the name of the game on it too. Partly because it helps set up the mood and partly because it means no matter what the players decide to do, I can just copy and paste them from the title onto the relevant map. I find this particularly useful in something like Shadowrun, because my players have a habit of never doing what I expect them to. That way if a player needs to check exactly what the different fire modes on a weapon mean, or exactly how they can use edge, they just need to open the handout Rolling Dice Alright, this is Shadowrun. There are two ways to deal with rolling the d6 of doom here; with a formula or with the dice tool. Smirky is trying to outdrive a bunch of unhappy people on a crowded highway. Something tells me that our boy should have used edge on that roll. Good thing too - 5 success is a lot healthier. If we wanted to, we could use the Dice Rolling tool. Personally, I prefer to just type the formula, but you might be someone who prefers an interface. This interface is pretty simple - just fill in the fields as required. Unlike when the guide was first written, there is now a way to change the dice pool for a roll in-macro, but it looks a little unwieldy when you look at it. Rolling initiative To calculate your initiative in Shadowrun, you roll your initiative score in d6 and then add your initiative to that value. When you write a guide you can pick the numbers. Luckily, we can do that straight in the command line and avoid doing math during a late night game session! But this is the simplest method because you just need your brain. When combat starts, click on the tokens and select the markers option. The simply select a color for each initiative pass each character has at that time. Setting up a Character Sheet You can automate some of the rolls in character sheets now, too. Just use Attributes and Abilities. Unfortunately, as with Macros, there does not seem to be a way to set whether to use edge Exploding Dice! That being said, here are some character sheet tips that my players and I find really useful. We create and manage our characters on Chummer which is free and well-supported , then tell the program to print the character sheet as text. This displays a preview window, which we can copy and paste directly into the character sheet. Fill these in with your physical and stun track, and put your physical initiative in the Init field. You could also create a MagicInit or MatrixInit for characters that require them. Then move the cursor to the space between Init and d6 and get rid of the space there. You should end up with this screen: Before we save this character, we just need to scroll to the bottom and press duplicate. This saves a lot of time when we move on to our next character or NPC; paste in the new character sheet, drag a new portrait image in and alter the Physical, Stun and Initiative values. To do that, click on the token and press the cogwheel 1 or double click on the token. Then select the character sheet to link the token to 2 and select Physical for bar 1 and Stun for Bar 2 3. Your character is now linked, and any changes you make to the physical or stun values will be tracked throughout the table. Some useful Macros Roll a regular Test [[? And pay your fixers a finders fee, dangit!
