

Chapter 1 : Shopping for an Out-of-Town Home | Pamela Strassner - Perrysburg & Toledo Homes for Sale

Apr 17, Â· There is more bad news for the high street, with evidence that retailers including Next and Marks & Spencer as well as discount chains are steadily moving out of town.

Even the shop fittings had been on offer in the closing down sales. Around Britain, 20, pensions are at risk of having to fall back on the national protection scheme. The Back to School promotions now getting under way ought to be a bumper time for it. And as its finances headed for the cliff edge, he passed it on to a woefully inadequate new owner. MPs concluded Sir Philip left the company "on life support", its pension fund starved of funding. He is the latest to be dubbed "the unacceptable face of capitalism". There are quite a few such faces. A Gallup poll, reported in The Economist, suggests big business is trusted by less than a fifth of Americans. Diminished market But perhaps the former boss of the defunct retailer is not the only one responsible. BHS collapsed because its market had diminished. You could argue that Sir Philip should have invested to update the business model and compete. But the main reason BHS lost market is because its rivals had a more attractive offer. The formula of school uniforms, cheap-ish fashion, value homewares and lighting did not respond to the rise of Primark, the non-food offering of Tesco and Asda, and IKEA. Yes, this was a company forced out of business by its competitors. Such churn is to be expected, as a necessary part of business. And for all that plus jobs are going in Scotland, and 11, across the UK, many other roles have been created as those rivals have expanded. But while retailers come and go - think also Woolworths, Comet, Borders, Brantano, Austin Reed - what is different now is that healthy retailers are in retreat from the traditional high street. Instead of showing their strength by expanding to have a presence in every shopping centre, the multiples are shedding less profitable stores. That means cities can retain outlets, but mid-size towns lose out. And both city and town centres have lost out immense amounts of footfall to out-of-town malls and supermarkets. According to Prof Steve Burt, a retail expert at Stirling University, that is proving to be the unit that is hardest to fill. Those still operating them are struggling to entice people off the ground floor. Boots has lost its appeal in photography and homewares. Only last week, approval was given to delivery by drone, making the online shopping experience even more convenient, and perhaps curtailing the rapid rise of small van deliveries. Moreover, the internet provides the means for quick price comparisons. If they are to compete, that squeezes the margins on shops. One response is what you find at Sports Direct - space crammed full of stock, competing on price, and now notoriously fierce stock-handling efficiency. Low-cost access This can be in a big branded store, or in an independent, where shopkeepers know their community and their customers personally. That is seen as one of the successes of the short Bank Street in Kilmarnock. It draws people off the conventional, pedestrianised King Street towards smartly refurbished buildings, small, independent boutiques, a one-stop shared premises for seven businesses offering complementary wedding services, plus coffee shops and bars. She is also a reminder that the internet is not all bad for conventional retail. It offers low-cost access to big networks of existing and potential customers. The squeeze on retail comes with a warning of a formidably big squeeze on jobs. The British Retail Consortium published a report in February forecasting , jobs could go, out of around three million in shopping. Of , shops, 74, could shut, and the worst-hit areas would be the more marginal ones. This came, of course, with a plea to government not to load on the costs of the new minimum wage structure, and the Apprenticeship Levy. To another retail expert at Stirling, Professor Leigh Sparks, planning policy has meant 40 to 50 years when people have been drawn out of town centres. It was where the retailers and their customers chose to go. Small, more rural towns were crying out for their own outlets of the big supermarket chains. While the major supermarkets - notably Tesco, Asda and Morrisons - have been badly burned by failing to prepare for the shift from the big weekly family shop to convenience shopping more often each week, the professor says that the attempts to revive town centres is not going to be achieved overnight. The policy has been to push councils into "town centre first" strategies. These encourage employers into town centre offices, sometimes starting with council employees themselves. Out-of-town retail planning permission has to clear much higher hurdles than previously. And the review of town centres has highlighted the need for them to adapt by finding more diverse uses. That can include leisure. Gyms are being run from bigger empty shops. Unused shop space can become community centres, available for meetings, events and cultural happenings. Landlords can help stimulate activity and footfall by offering rent-free opportunities for pop-up shops. Retailers strenuously argue that councils should be doing more to do the same with business rates, and that reform should shift from fixed annual costs to a share of turnover. They have proven remarkably resilient in the face of squeezed disposable income, though part of that churn of business means that they are part of the reason why the Great British boozer is feeling beleaguered. The pubs that are thriving are expanding into improved-quality food and craft beer. Town centres can also be revived as attractive places to live. In most towns and cities, if you look above the shop fronts, you will often find empty space and sometimes fine, distinctive but neglected architecture. In the end, town centres will not be revived by plans or planners or retail investments, but by shoppers. It is the effect of many millions of individual decisions to move away from the high street that has left it looking weakened. It is by reversing that trend that town centres can recover. So next time you see an empty shop and complain about the fat cats who milked it for profit and abandoned its staff, ask yourself if you have played any part in that process.

Chapter 2 : Lilycove Department Store - Bulbapedia, the community-driven Pok mon encyclopedia

Where Should I Live? From low crime rates to a great education system, there are many variables to consider when choosing that perfect place that you and your family can call home. How to Choose a Place to Live Begin by determining what is most important to you and your family. If you have a family, on the other hand, a small town offers amenities that your kids will love. I did a lot of research before I decided where I wanted to move. Here are some of the tips that helped me the most when I was choosing a place to live. Affordability No matter what your pay grade is, living comfortably and within your means should be your first concern. Affordability includes more than just housing expenses; the prices for consumable goods, like groceries, vary greatly from town to town. The price of gasoline, utility services including electric and water, and taxes, also varies. When I moved from California to New Mexico, my expenses dropped like a rock overnight. My rent was cut in half, and I now spend a lot less money on groceries, gas, and utility bills. Affordability has since become my top priority whenever I think about moving to a new locale. Taxes Did you know that there are five states that have no sales taxes? These are important factors to consider when choosing a place to live. The Tax Foundation measures the state-local tax burden , which calculates the percentage of income that taxpayers pay for state and local taxes. In addition, 40 states provide property tax credits or homestead exemptions that can provide homeowners with some additional tax relief. Employment Opportunities Employment opportunities vary from state to state and city to city, so spend some time researching the job markets in different areas of the country. Start by analyzing quality employment opportunities within your industry, then determine where the highest concentration of these jobs are located. Do you want to be an investment banker? Are you a teacher? Your options will expand considerably since education is sought after in just about any city or town. Income levels for jobs can vary greatly from state to state. Salaries are often based on where the job is located. For example, a marketing manager job might come with a large salary in San Diego, but the cost of living is very high in Southern California. Do your research before you move, and ideally, find a job before you relocate. Real Estate Value Since buying a home is the single largest investment you will probably ever make, you need to seriously consider this factor. In addition, carefully review local housing price trends. Do you have the opportunity to buy a home in an area where prices are at an all-time high, perhaps representing a bubble? Is the local town or city in the process of being further developed and therefore may become more attractive to future home buyers? By researching the crime rates and statistics for various areas, you can learn more about the safety of a town or neighborhood. If you have already decided where you want to live, stop by the local police stations to discuss your new neighborhood. The police will be happy to discuss any concerns you have about the area. You can also check out Crime Reports , which lets you review crime statistics for different neighborhoods. Keep in mind that just because an area is safe today does not guarantee that it will be safe in the future. The long-term stability for a neighborhood can be a determining factor in how safe your surroundings are. Also, consider the future development of a particular location as you narrow down your choices. Proximity to Family and Friends Do you have a large extended family? Do you spend the holidays with your family and friends? These are important factors to consider when choosing where to live. If extended family and friends are important to you, choose a place either within driving distance or within a reasonable distance by plane. Climate Like to ski all winter long? Not a fan of humidity? You may want to avoid settling in Florida any time soon. I grew up in New England and swore that I would one day escape to a warmer climate; I hated winter that much. I knew that I would be more comfortable in dry, hot climates, so my entire adult life I have lived in California and New Mexico, away from snow, bugs, and humidity. The climate plays a large role in our lives as it impacts our hobbies, behavior, and sometimes even our jobs. Living in the climate in which you are most comfortable contributes to your mental health, so choose wisely! Education System A good education is essential to setting up children to better handle the rest of their lives, so the importance of good schools cannot be overstated. I have friends who moved from California to the Midwest so their kids could go to better schools. Nonprofit websites like GreatSchools are a great source for parents looking for the ideal schools for their children. The quality of the public schools factors into your finances, too, since tuition for a private school can be extremely expensive. Culture If you crave constant cultural stimulation, you definitely want to choose a place that has a lot of cultural offerings. When I lived in Los Angeles, I could see concerts, operas, sports teams, plays, and musicals all the time. Now that I live in New Mexico, the options for cultural experiences are much more limited, but that is OK with my new lifestyle. Many people need to be near their favorite team, or a vibrant music scene or the theater. If you have a favorite hobby or recreational activity, make sure that you can continue to pursue these interests in your new home. Finally, if you enjoy being around a specific religious or ethnic community with your same beliefs and interests, this should be a factor in where you choose to live. Commute Time and Public Transportation Options The explosive growth of the suburbs surrounding metropolitan areas have made commuting times in many areas unbearable. A recently released report from Sweden indicates that long-distance commuters actually have an increased risk of divorce. The length of time it takes to get to work can be a determining factor in the decision to move to a new locale. If you have a family, commuting can also drastically reduce the amount of time you spend at home. A good public transportation system is a major plus when choosing a place to live. If eating locally and sustainably is important to you, consider whether you can pursue this lifestyle in your new home. For me, the ability to grow my own food year-round with a home vegetable garden is a determining factor for choosing where to live. However, if trying new, diverse cuisines is one of your passions, a bigger metropolitan area is going to offer more choices than small-town America. Town or City Size If you enjoy a friendly wave from everyone you pass while driving to the post office, then a smaller town is definitely for you. If you wish to remain relatively anonymous, a larger town or a big city is better suited to your personality. I grew up in a smaller-sized town, moved to Los Angeles, and now I live in a rural town, so I have experienced both ends of the spectrum. I sometimes miss the anonymity of living in a big city, but I also like going to my favorite small-town diner where my waitress always knows my usual order. Healthcare Facilities Healthcare facilities are important at any stage in life, but they are especially relevant if you have children or if you are nearing retirement age. Easy access to good healthcare can increase your quality of life exponentially, so be on the lookout for towns and cities with good hospitals and medical schools. Often, there will be a correlation between cities and the quality of the healthcare. Proximity to an Airport If you travel a lot, you may need to live within close proximity of an airport. If you live more than an hour away from the closest airport, traveling to and from the airport can become very time-consuming and expensive. If you spend a healthy amount of time traveling, definitely consider the distance to the airport. Additional Resources While the above factors should be considered when choosing the ideal place to live, there are many more factors which will all play a role in your decision-making process. Luckily, there are several websites available to provide additional assistance when conducting your research: Full of geographical data and statistics on crime, cost of living, climate, hospitals, schools, and air pollution, along with a vast social network with 1., members, City-Data. The information can seem endless at times and it can take quite a bit of work to find exactly what you are looking for. This site offers a second quiz designed to help you decide where to live overseas. Answer eight questions to see five areas in the U. NeighborhoodScout lets you research neighborhoods, real estate, and real estate brokers all over the U. The website requires a paid subscription, but if you are serious about finding the ideal place to live, it may be a worthwhile investment. This website has a quiz that asks a series of questions about climate, economy, housing, and education, and then provides you with a list of places to live based on your answers. I took the quiz and was told that my ideal places to live were in Texas, Arizona, Oklahoma, and New Mexico. Right on the money! Enter the address on the website and the site instantly populates with a list including stores, restaurants, coffee shops, book stores, banks, and movie theaters in the immediate area, along with a Walk Score. Which City Fits You Best? A series of 17 questions will help match your personality to your ideal locale. Final Word The reality of choosing a new place to live encompasses an incredibly large series of factors, all competing for your attention. In order to be successful in your search, you must determine what is most important to you and your family, do your homework, and then continue to be vigilant in your search until you find the right place to live. It can be intimidating and frustrating at times, but all that effort is worth it in the end once you are settled in your ideal location. Where are you living now and how did you decide to settle there? What are the factors that are most important to you?
