Should colleges be allowed to implement smoking bans on their campuses? This raises the question: Yes, colleges should be allowed to implement smoking bans on their campuses. But that leaves out a big group of students: In fact, the bans protect their freedom to breathe air without sucking in pollution. Say a school banished ice cream from its campus to combat obesity, or mandated that students go to the gym at least four times per week. That would be a true violation of rights, since ice cream and lack of exercise only harm the individual. But sitting next to a smoker or even walking through a cloud of smoke on the way to class is dangerous. To protect the rights of smokers is to limit the rights of everybody else, who should have access to clean air all over campus. Smoking bans should be upheld for the sole reason that they protect students from second-hand smoke. No, colleges should not be allowed to implement smoking bans on their campuses. Last month the Pennsylvania legislature passed a state-wide smoking ban, which was meant to outlaw smoking in public places except for bars. He said the bill was intended to outlaw smoking in most indoor public places. The legality of blanket smoking bans is suspect, but the real issue is that these smoking bans do more harm than good. They isolate and stigmatize students who choose to smoke, criminalizing a behavior that is common among college students and is not going to go away anytime soon not even federal alcohol laws have not stopped college kids from drinking. Furthermore, these bans will lead to students spending much more time off campus, which could be harmful to their studies. And then there are the professors who smoke, many of whom live on campus and will unfairly be censured by the university for a habit that is within their legal rights. However, secondhand smoke is much less of an issue in the open air. Frankly, these laws are Puritan. They address an issue of personal choice, and while colleges might technically have the right to implement them, they are harmful to a large number of students and employees. The opinions in these pieces do not represent those of Unigo.
