Wally Waller - bass, guitar, vocals, piano, wind instruments Old Man Tropic: We get to see Sorrow go from happy child to an isolated, depressed man. But the crowning B. A Day in the Life: The album follows the life of Sebastian F. Unlike Tommy from Tommy , or Pink from The Wall who at least overcame their isolation, Sorrow remains isolated by the end of the album, and it appears he will never get over the tragic events that isolated him in the first place. Sorrow, as a child, always wanted to visit the Moon, as heard in "Bracelets on Fingers". He sort of gets his wish in the song "The Journey", but the Moon becomes his head. Sorrow is taken to one of these in his own head by Baron Saturday. Unfortunately for her, it does the same thing as the Hindenburg. The City that Sorrow lives in is built around the Misery Factory, where most of its citizens work. Journey to the Center of the Mind: Baron Saturday takes Sorrow into the centre of his own head that is, the moon in order to reflect on his life and find the truth. The protagonist is named Sorrow, and absolutely nothing in his life goes right. He then lifts Sorrow off the ground and this allows Sorrow to fly. Sorrow flies into his own mouth where two large wooden doors are. Baron Saturday opens these doors and inside is a room full of Mirrors, each one showing Sorrow a memory from his childhood. Never Be Hurt Again: In order to avoid the harshness of reality and the cruelty of others, Sorrow shuts himself down mentally and isolates himself physically. Past in the Rear-View Mirror: All of the Mirrors in the Mirror Hall Sorrow is taken to shows events from his childhood past. Often cited as an early example of a rock opera. Around "Death", most, if not all, of the songs show the mental health of Sorrow decline dramatically. Sorrow goes to a country called "Amerik" after getting Married. Sorrow serves during this war.
