But newspaper and magazine horoscopes? They get even less respect, from both skeptics and true believers. The first real newspaper horoscope column is widely credited to R. Naylor, a prominent British astrologer of the first half of the 20th century. Astrology posits that the natural world and we human beings in it are affected by the movements of the sun, moon and stars through the heavens, and that who we are is shaped by the exact position of these celestial bodies at the time of our birth. A natal star chart, therefore, presents the sky on the date and exact time of birth, from which the astrologer extrapolates character traits and predictions. Following the interest the public showed in the Princess Margaret horoscope, the paper decided to run several more forecasts from Naylor. Suddenly, a lot more people were paying attention to the star column. The column offered advice to people whose birthdays fell that the week, but within a few years, Naylor or a clever editor determined that he needed to come up with something that could apply to larger volumes of readers. Cainer also noted that there are few places in newspapers and, to some extent magazines, that address the reader directly: Whether those features are the spoonful of sugar to help the hard news medicine go down or whether people just pick up the paper for the horoscope makes little difference to the bottom line. So as to why newspapers run horoscopes, the answer is simple: A National Science Foundation survey from found that just 12 percent of Americans read their horoscope every day or often, while 32 percent read them occasionally. More recently, the American Federation of Astrologers put the number of Americans who read their horoscope every day as high as 70 million, about 23 percent of the population. Astrologers, meanwhile, were far more sanguine – your sign is still your sign, they counseled; some, Cainer included, sighed that the wobble story was just another salvo in the fiercely pitched battle between astronomers and astrologers. At the same time, a significant portion of the population believe in the underpinnings of newspapers horoscopes. Respect for astrology itself may be on the rise: People who read their horoscopes also pay attention to what they say. More recent research, published in the October issue of the Journal of Consumer Research, found that people who read a negative horoscope were more likely to indulge in impulsive or self-indulgent behavior soon after. Why are people willing to re-order their love lives, buy a lottery ticket, or a take a new job based on the advice of someone who knows nothing more about them than their birthdate? One reason we can rule out is scientific validity. Of all the empirical tests that have been done on astrology, in all fields, says Dr. For example, in a study published in the journal Nature, Dr. A study out in , conducted by former astrologer Dr. Geoffrey Dean and psychologist Dr. Ivan Kelly, tracked the lives of 2, subjects who were all born within minutes of one another over several decades. The theory was that if astrological claims about star position and birthdates were true, then the individuals would have shared similar traits; they did not. Astrologers are, unsurprisingly, not impressed by scientific efforts to prove or disprove astrology, claiming that scientists are going about it all wrong – astrology is not empirical in the way that, say, physics is: Forer gave his students a personality test, followed by a description of their personality that was supposedly based on the results of the test. In reality, there was only ever one description, cobbled together from newspaper horoscopes, and everyone received the same one. Part of what was happening was that the descriptions were positive enough, without being unbelievably positive: You have a great deal of unused capacity which you have not turned to your advantage. While you have some personality weaknesses, you are generally able to compensate for them. At times you have serious doubts as to whether you have made the right decision or done the right thing. At times you are extroverted, affable, sociable, while at other times you are introverted, wary, reserved. Even horoscope writers admit that some of their success rests in not saying too much. You develop the art of being vague. French, the Goldsmith psychologist, notes that people who read horoscopes are often invested in making their horoscope right for them. On the one hand, the straightforward answer is that, according to a host of scientific studies, astrology does not work. That observation tallies with what other psychologists say:

Margaret Hamilton, a psychologist at the University of Wisconsin who found that people are more likely to believe favorable horoscopes, noted that people who are believers in astrology also tend to be more anxious or neurotic. Newspaper horoscopes, she said, offer a bit of comfort, a sort of seeing through the veil on a casual level. We have a very, very strong predisposition to notice regularities in nature and the world, to the extent that we see more than there are. There are good evolutionary reasons for this, in short a false positive is less risky than failure to observe a truth. Astra inclinans non necessitat. It all depends on whom you ask and, of course, on the appropriateness of the advice being given. It is also an insult to the science of psychology and the richness of human personality. After the BBC fielded a bunch of complaints, Cox offered a statement, which the broadcaster probably wisely chose not to release: I should have said that this new age drivel is undermining the very fabric of our civilization. And people hate doing nothing. She covers the weird stuff for Smithsonian.

Plans with him are always big and dramatic, and showering with admiration, devotion and attention come really natural both ways. This is a man who gives many gifts when they are in love, often expensive and posing as a statement of his effort. Any partner that wants to stay with him has to prove that they are worthy of royal treatment and ready to give enough of it back. A Leo man will love compliments, and although he appears confident, he needs a lot of praise to start feeling safe around their loved one too. He is known to easily take the roll of an eternal bachelor, always on the hunt and celebrating love and life. He will put himself in the center of attention, and his partner could compete with a number of admirers, but their relationship is not in danger for as long as he is adored the way he loves to be. When treated right, he will stick around forever. How to Attract the Leo Woman Leo women are very warm-hearted and driven by the desire to be loved and admired, and as all people born under the Leo zodiac sign, love to be in the limelight. To seduce her, one has to treat her well, respect her, compliment her and see her fit to live a luxurious lifestyle she deserves. Dating a Leo woman requires acceptance of her flaws and admiration for her qualities. A woman born under the Sun sign of Leo will always enjoy a visit to a theater, an art museum or a fancy restaurant. She wants to be showered with flowers and gifts, but as grandiose displays of affection rather than an expensive routine of her partner. She can be a bit domineering and needs to stay in control of her own life. If her partner holds her as valued and queen-like as she is, there is infinite warmth, care, and attention in her heart to respond.
