*There are 66 ways in which to make love, so says the matron of an all-female erotic house in Philip Kaufman's Henry and June (). Based on the book, Henry and June: From A Journal of Love: the Unexpurgated Diary of Ana's Nin (), taken from the unpublished material of Nin's diaries, the film illuminates only one of the many intimate and exploratory liaisons of author.*

Shutterstock To be fair, I have spent my fair share of weekend nights out with a best friend or pack of ladies, all of us dressed like hookers and doing outrageous things to attract the attention of the general public. Being an American something in , this is practically a female developmental stage. I think of this behavior as a sort of extension of the dress-up games we played as little girls, before we really understood the power of stilettos and halter-tops. Essentially what we are doing is role-playing. We are figuring out who we are and what we like by trying on various personalities via our wardrobes, or the slutty wardrobes of our closest friends. The bonding ritual of young women getting dressed for a night out with their ladies has undeniable resonance. The bad music, the terrible make-up advice, the pre-drinkingâ€¦ Most of us do this at least a few times, and many of us do it on a schedule for many of our formidable adult years. It is like a confidence building exercise, the preening and grooming of each other as four of us smash into a tiny bathroom to assess our sartorial choices. But we all want to feel like the prettiest, the sexiest, the one who is both universally loved by her group, while being the beacon that will attract the best male specimens wherever our drinking takes us. This is how we all want to feel before we squeeze into a taxi and head out. I have absolutely no problem with it. What does bother me, and this may be because I am finally approaching the big , is the way we dress ourselves in these initial adult years. Having been a real live adult woman for over 10 years now, having lived in cities all across the USA, I can tell you a secret hypocritical phenomenon that almost every woman I have been friends with has enacted, myself included. We nearly all bitch about being objectified or about the social-pressure to be thin and pretty and then turn around and pour ourselves into mini-skirts and backless tops and revel in the intoxicating sensation of feeling sexy in public. Now, there is nothing wrong with feeling this sensual. In fact, almost any guy will tell you that one of the most attractive things a woman can do is feel sexy. But there are so many better ways to feel alluring than to strap on 5-inch Lucite heels and a top that requires a bra made out of stickers. But I believe that we can make perfectly good fashion mistakes with a little more dignity and class, and that our entire generation, and the ones that follow, will benefit from taking a few steps back on the sexy scale. A tube top looks great with an ankle length skirt and heels, and with some fabulous hair and eyeliner, you get to look and feel stunning with out showing the world all your girly bits. I have them, will wear them, love themâ€¦ But with an entire tee shirt, or cuffed button down, and would never wear them to anyplace nice. Showcasing a single part of your naughty self can be fun, playful, and stylish. Further, we need to support our lady friends and help each other make better fashion choices. I hope for a future where we do not judge our worth, and that of our besties, by the slutty pictures we tag each other in online. We need to be happy enough with who and what we are that we stand out for being ourselves and for being comfortable with who we are, or at least who we are becoming. How a culture chooses to adorn itself says a lot about what that society values. I want us to value ourselves and other young women more. We are a precious commodity; we are going to make the future happen. Add a little mystery to your ensemble. Dress to impress, not to show off. More From Thought Catalog.

Reich , and I conducted a conversation, part analysis and part repudiation, one wherein we discussed how a lesbian woman and straight man both found fault with the essay and its central premise. Some things beg a response and her essay was just one of those things. My friends joke that I have a uniform â€” skinny jeans and Oxford shoes, accompanied by either a v-neck t-shirt or a button-down. Apparently, women enjoy being objectified: There is an insidious negation of otherness i. Indeed, very few things in this world abide by a strict dichotomy; the world is not black and white. What I find sexy is different from what you find sexy. It is championing an antiquated, Western view of femininity. As women, we are not commodities, nor are we objects: We have the freedom to make our own choices and uphold our own agency. To put it simply: Zaron â€” As you point out with laser sharpness, her article fails to boldly step outside the boundaries it points out and intends to transcend. Rather than stomp across the terra with all the confidence she wishes to grant women, Basque, in effect, is suggesting, that just like her, other women need to learn to walk softly in order to be free of any unfair and unwanted attention. She sees the problem, does the math, but then she ignores the answer. For example, if you wish to pay respect in a foreign circumstance, such as when women cover their hair when traveling in the Arab world, or when I, as a non-Jewish man, choose to wear a kippa when visiting a synagogue, or when you wear black to a funeral, these are choices. And that also means as provocative as they like; whether you or anyone else likes it or not. And dear Bijou, this is the flaw in your well-meaning attempt to empower women. You are suggesting women beg favor from a sexist system predicated on a male gaze. An adult claims the power of their position and status in life by making choices that are approved solely by them. There is no better or worse way to be sexy. More From Thought Catalog.

The euphemisms are getting a bit stale, suffice to say: four people in Boston -- two of whom are much more prolific writers than the other two (including the originator of this blog, who has no excuse apart from laziness) -- who drink and tell.

Bijou squirmed at first and then realized it was less dangerous to lie still, for he was carefully shaving her pubic hair, beginning at the edges, where it lay sparse and shining on her velvet belly. The belly came down in a soft curve there.
