Chapter 4 Chapter Text Maura never bothered to understand the intricacies of how homicide detectives got assigned to cases in the San Francisco Police Department. She did the autopsy, oversaw the processing of forensic evidence, and wrote her reports. After enough cases, she could tell which detectives were better than others, either because they actually cared about the victims or simply because they were good at their job. But she never went to the trouble of trying to predict when those detectives would be at a crime scene. So it came as somewhat of a surprise that she found herself wondering when Jane would be at a crime scene again. She wondered how the Boston Police Department detectives got assigned cases, if there was a set rotation, or if it depended on their currently open cases. She wondered if Jane ever had to work night shifts, and if that meant that they could go weeks without seeing each other at work. As part of preparing to take this job, Maura had researched population, murder and crime rates, and overall past death rates in cities and towns across the state in order to divide responsibilities among herself and the district medical examiners. Although she assumed she would have to make some adjustments eventually, her region currently included some of the larger Boston suburbs, like Cambridge, Somerville, Watertown, Brookline, and Newton. This meant that this first month of work involved lots of new police departments and different bureaucracies to learn and lots of people to meet. Every new potential murder victim, like the one this morning, meant a whole new round of introductions. Everything had gone relatively smoothly so far, but still Maura felt herself wishing this morning that she would be seeing a friendly face, and she had to admit she was looking forward to seeing Jane in the autopsy lab again. She was drinking coffee and he was eating what looked like a five course breakfast, which of course had been prepared by their mother. Angela had come to work at the cafe a few years ago when it had been nothing but bad coffee and a sad assortment of donuts and pastries. She had taken over the whole operation and turned it into a nice cafe with full breakfast and lunch. Do you want me to see if he can get you any? Isles and her kid. I like her kid. Probably call some references. I figured I can make him a Red Sox fan. No excuses," Angela said, punctuating the last statement by jabbing her index finger at Jane and walking away before either of them could argue with her. And you know Ma thinks she has to atone. Frankie never disagreed with their mother the way she did. Jane dropped her head, knowing that she should be easier on her mother. Instead Maura was clearly checking her out. See you later," Maura said, shaking her head at herself. But would you like to do something else with us this weekend? Perhaps we could go back to the park? You have my number right? Just text me tomorrow. Maura said she would pack a picnic lunch. Jane suggested that instead of going back to the nearby park, they go to the Esplanade along the Charles River. Maura agreed, happy to have the opportunity to explore more of the city. It was sunny and hotter than normal for September. Maura had taken the opportunity of what might be the last really warm day of the year to wear a pale yellow sundress and sandals. Is there something wrong with this? Let me change quickly. Billy came into the living room then and Jane said, "Hey, buddy, ready to go? While they waited for Maura to change, Jane used an app on her phone to request a cab and received a message that one would be there within ten minutes. Maura came back after changing into a pair of cargo capris and a tank top covered by an unbuttoned sheer long sleeve shirt. They went outside and waited a few minutes for the cab. Jane explained it was easiest to take a cab because there was no parking along the river and the closest parking they would find could be blocks away. When the cab arrived they all piled in the back and Jane directed the driver to the north end of Dartmouth Street where they could take a footbridge over Storrow Drive to get to the Esplanade. The cab dropped them off and Jane led them over the footbridge and down a pathway to get to a larger open area of grass along the river. There were other groups with picnic blankets spread on the grass, along with cyclists who were taking a break from their ride to look at the view, and runners and cyclists using the paved paths. Maura pointed to a spot under a tree and they spread out the blanket in the shade. Billy immediately took his football out of the bag and said, "Jane, can we do the passing routes like before? Post, slant, corner, quick out, hook. Billy was already running to get into position and Jane looked at Maura and asked, "Okay? Jane moved to form the third point in their triangle and Billy threw the ball to Maura. It was a low throw and she almost caught it, but it dropped to the ground. Maura picked up the ball and threw it to Jane. It was a little wobbly but it got to her. They played like that for a while with varying degrees of success and with Billy providing energetic commentary the whole time. Sometimes I think I missed out. How did you learn to play football? There was always some sort of game happening. And make sure you come over the top on the throw, rather than from the side. That will help with accuracy. He threw the ball back to Jane and she tossed it to Maura. Maura resisted the very strong and unbidden urge to ask Jane to come show her exactly how she should move her body. Instead she tried to replicate what Jane had done and threw the ball to Billy. She smiled at Jane and asked, "How was that? After lunch, Jane was ready for a nap, but Billy was up and ready to play some more. Her hands still needed a break from football so she asked them both, "Wanna go over to the dock and get a better look at the river? Wanna check it out? The water level was low enough that they could sit on the edge, legs dangling over the water. Jane pointed out landmarks on both sides of the river like the MIT campus on the Cambridge side, and the Prudential and Hancock buildings, the weather beacon, and the Citgo sign behind them and to their west on the Boston side. Jane looked where he was pointing at a boat that was moving towards them. The military used similar ones but these ones take people on tours. They go on the street through downtown Boston and then finish the tour by coming into the river. Can we do that here too? Do you have a bike? If you want to. Billy got up and Jane followed him back to their spot. Everyone agreed that they were ready to head home so they packed everything up and walked back over the footbridge and over to Beacon Street to get a cab to bring them home. Back at their building, Maura unlocked her apartment door and let Billy inside. She turned back to Jane so she could get the cooler and said, "Thank you for today. I should be thanking you. Jane dropped her head and sighed, a little embarrassed by her statement. And I have a nice time with you and Billy, of course. Instead she said, "Would you like to join us for dinner?"

Chapter 3 : When was Laura Godwin born

This book is about a dog named Happy and a cat named Honey as they enjoy Fall. Follow along as they show you what they think is the best Fall of all for them. The book has easy text, my son needed no help with reading or understanding the information.

Honey, a playful orange kitten, wants Happy, the sleepy dog, to play with her, but he would much rather nap. Honey is a persistent little cat, however, and by the end of the book, the two pets happily chase one another around the house. Though the text in this story is easy to read, the structure of it is also Happy and Honey is a Pre-Level One Ready-to-Read book, and the first title in the Happy Honey series. Though the text in this story is easy to read, the structure of it is also fairly sophisticated. The book can easily be divided into three parts. In the first section, Honey offers various things to Happy. Honey has a toy for you. Honey has a kiss for you. Honey wants to wash your ears. Honey wants to wash your nose. Repetition is a great way for kids to reinforce new words and new sentence structures. Repeating the same type of sentence for several pages in a row also makes it easy to introduce just one new word at a time. The repetition also helps to build up the suspense of the story - will Happy eventually give into Honey? What will it take? These questions become the reason the reader keeps turning the pages, and the action sequence at the end of the story rewards all the build-up with an exciting finish. Like the simple text, the illustrations are also uncluttered. The reader sees only the two animals, and just the few small props mentioned by the text. By omitting any background details, the illustrator helps the reader focus on the images that can best help them decode the text. There is no question as to what is happening on each page, because there are no distractions from the main action being described in the text. I am amazed at the number of easy readers out there that focus on relationships between animals. I have to wonder sometimes whether kids find those dynamics as interesting as adults think they do. Kids do tend to love animals, but I do think there are probably some other topics out there that would lend themselves to interesting stories.
