List of Hank the Cowdog characters Hank: Hank is the main character and narrator of each story in the Hank the Cowdog adventures. Hank is the only character to appear in every single story in the series. Hank claims to be a "purebred top-of-the-line blue-ribbon cowdog" but is in fact most likely a mutt. He styles himself as the "Head of Ranch Security" and conducts security sweeps and nightly patrols. However his real task is to serve as the assistant to Slim and Loper in herding cattle. Hank has a superiority complex which causes him to have an inflated sense of his own intelligence, strength, courage and attractiveness. As a result of this, Hank frequently finds himself in sticky situations, usually of his own creation. Much of the humor of the series comes from Hank as narrator shamelessly attempting to make himself seem more competent with hindsight than he really was, but the reader is rarely fooled. Despite his flaws Hank is deeply loyal to his family and the ranch community and usually rises to the occasion at the moment of true crisis. The neighbor wanted to use the dog to help with the cattle but the dog was not trained and proved a hassle. Drover is a younger dog who lives on the ranch with Hank. Hank refers to him as his assistant, or as a "little mutt" when Hank is angry with him. Unlike Hank, Drover has no delusions of grandeur and enjoys spending most his time staying out of trouble and sleeping 16 hours a day according to Hank , often engaging in useless tasks he invents for himself. In The Case of the Car-Barkaholic Dog, for example, Hank observes that while he is helping the cowboys with the cattle herding, Drover spends the afternoon chewing on an old horn, buries it, and then promptly forgets where it is buried. He is also unashamedly timid, and frequently avoids "the call of duty" by pretending to have a bad leg. Drover has a great deal of curiosity and often asks Hank obscure questions such as "Why does the moon rise in the evening and set in the morning? Drover often appears to have more common sense than Hank, which allows him to avoid getting into many of the same catastrophes Hank creates for himself. She is a housewife who enjoys parties and often serves as a civilizing check on her cowboy husband. Pete the Barn Cat is her favorite pet and she is affectionate towards both him and Drover. She dislikes Hank, however, and frequently gets angry at him for coming into her yard, her house or fighting with Pete. Her most common response when angered is to try to hit him with her broom. Despite this Hank often seems to think that Sally May secretly respects him. In reality, her feelings fluctuate between disgust and temporary respect as Hank usually follows up his shenanigans with an act of heroism. Owner of the ranch, High Loper his last name is never given is an old-fashioned cowboy who enjoys roping, riding and working his ranch. While Loper never wants to leave the ranch and is loath to go out of town, he is far from a workaholic, settling for shoddy workmanship on many of his projects and pawning the dirty work onto his ranch hand, Slim Chance. His more anti-social cowboy instincts have been tamed by his wife, who he loves. However, in some episodes he expresses nostalgia for the times when he was just a simple cowboy. While Loper makes fun of Hank frequently and is often angry at him, he also relies on Hank to help with the cattle herding. Little Alfred middle name Leroy likes Hank and often participates in adventures with him. Some of these are harmless, though in "The Case of the Hooking Bull" Alfred deliberately tricks Hank into going into the dryer and then turning the machine on, showing he has a mischievous streak. In this story and a few others Alfred is shown to have the ability to talk to animals, although in later stories he does not appear to have this ability. It is revealed that the older a child gets, the more their ability to understand animals diminishes. Alfred first appears in book 2, The Further Adventures of Hank the Cowdog, though he is referred to at that time only as "the baby. Pete is much more clever than Hank and usually manages to outwit him, although Hank usually perceives the events differently. In "The Case of the Missing Cat" Hank eventually loses patience with Pete and tries to strand him on the plains, but has a change of heart and rescues him from the coyotes Rip and Snort. At the end of the adventure, however, the two return to fighting over scraps, suggesting that they both secretly like their antagonistic relationship. A lazy but loyal cowboy and ranch hand that works for High Loper. It is unclear how long Slim has worked at the ranch, but despite several comments made about wanting to move to a bigger operation, he has never quit. Slim lives in a run down shack two miles from ranch headquarters, and maintains a filthy house, frequently leaving old dishes, clothes, food, and livestock magazines lying around and fostering a chronic rodent problem. He also hates cooking, which results in him maintaining a horrible diet and eating things that would disgust the average reader, like sardine and ketchup sandwiches and boiled turkey necks. Although Slim loves to play pranks on Hank and poke fun at him, it is clear he has an affinity for both him and Drover, frequently asking them to come along with him on odd jobs. Two buzzards that Hank sometimes encounters. Wallace, an old buzzard and father to Junior, is very harsh and abrasive, not easily getting along with most of the other characters of the series. He is also relatively single-minded, judging most things mainly on their usefulness as a food source. He loves his father but often makes Wallace angry by being cowardly, being friendly towards other animals who Wallace says they should rather think about eating , and generally being bad at being a buzzard. Two coyote brothers who have a grudge against Hank. However, they are enemies in every other book. They are vicious and strong, but not very smart, and Hank manages to escape from sticky situations involving them by tricking them. They call Hank "Hunk. He is the brother of Missy Coyote, to which Hank was once promised in marriage. He is smarter, tougher, and more grumpy than Rip and Snort. Hank ultimately refused to do so, showing that he is loyal to the ranch inhabitants, and loyal to Drover as a good friend. A collie who resides on a local ranch, and with whom Hank is madly in love. He is constantly trying to impress her, which usually results in his making a fool of himself instead. Beulah lives on her ranch with her boyfriend Plato, a bird dog who Hank despises. Although she likes Hank as a friend, she does not return his love, and tries to let him down easy for fear of hurting his feelings. A witch owl who assists Hank on occasion. She has a bodyguard, a rattlesnake named Timothy, who lives in the same hole as her. When she does use her magic, it normally is very odd and may not have the desired results. For example, in Lost in the Dark Uncharnted Forest , she and Hank were tied upside-down to a tree branch, while Rip and Snort were planning to eat them below. She recited a spell to make them stop, but, because they were upside-down, it just made them sing their song backwards. A basset hound who lives in the local dog pound. His owner works at the pound and just puts him in whichever kennel is currently available. He has a fairly uneventful life, except when his owner lets him out as happens in The Fling. A raccoon who occasionally shows up and causes trouble. He was orphaned as a baby and Slim took care of him for a while in Moonlight Madness. Everytime Slim puts Eddy in a cage, Eddy convinces Hank to let him out and enter the cage himself, at which point Eddy locks him in. Despite this, Hank continues to be fooled and does not particularly like Eddy. List of books[ edit ].

I had just finished fueling up the RV at a rural gas station about 1. Not being too worried about a small critter that excels at hiding, I ignored the question and prepared to head off to our next campground. Then came a statement that would upend our day: I pulled away from the pumps and parked while we searched for our cat. Now, this is not a big RV and there are not many places for a cat to hide. Foxy is a Maine Coon cat, which is a large breed and weighs almost 14 pounds. We both looked for her throughout the entire coach. We even looked under the dashboard. She has never spent time outdoors. Both at home and in the RV she has never shown any interest in going outdoors and will usually move away from an open door. Within a few minutes it seemed abundantly clear our cat was not in the RV. The obvious thought was that she somehow escaped during fueling, so we started canvassing the immediate area with no success. Foxy takes up most of a loveseat, weighing almost 14 pounds. We then thought back to earlier in the morning when we were leaving our campsite in Mesa. Karla and I have a normal pre-departure routine when leaving campgrounds. We could not be sure she was in the RV when we left and it was entirely possible she escaped in the campground while we were going in and out of the door, 1. Foxy always relaxes on the bed during our drives. So now we have two areas to cover. We both figured the higher chance of escape was in the morning, so we left a picture of Foxy and a phone number with the gas station clerk, unhooked our Subaru from the RV and headed south for Monte Vista RV Resort. Everyone at the resort was very nice and many went out of their way to help. Neighbors near our site offered to put out cat food and saucers of milk and promised to keep an eye out. After a few hours of searching in vain and envisioning horrible scenarios involving the local wildlife coyotes and hawks are abundant, as are rattlesnakes and the busy roadways, we figured we should leave and redouble our efforts at the gas station. After all, we had many sets of eyes helping us at Monte Vista, but nothing up north. The ride back north was long and uncomfortable, with thoughts of the inevitable creeping into our consciousness. Karla decides to check the RV one final time, just in case. Well, guess who was sleeping on the bed! Yes, Foxy was safe and sound the entire time, and looking rather nonplussed about the whole ordeal. We literally tore the entire RV apart looking for her and have absolutely no idea where she was.

When I got to Fuzzy Friends, everything seemed totally normal. A couple of college-age girls were peering into the cat cages and cooing at their favorites. I made my way to the back. Usually when I volunteer at Fuzzy Friends, I sweep the floor or walk dogs. I hardly ever go in the back. He was totally excited to see me! He grabbed my arm and dragged me into a corner. But it was empty. He started pacing the floor. She belongs to our biggest donor, Patricia Watson-Butterbottom. We were supposed to be boarding Esmeralda while her owner went on a cruise. Watson-Butterbottom will stop paying the rent on the building and Fuzzy Friends will have to close! Where could she have gone? Think you could help me out? Say no to this old man doubled over in pain?! So I took Peanut and began to walk slowly around the premises of the building. I knew that having a dog with me was probably NOT going to help me catch a frightened cat. He may have done most of the frighteningâ€¦but still! He was sniffing around a bush and I figured he was looking for a place to pee when I heard a surprised yelp out of Peanut and then a white, yowling blur flew out of the bush and rushed past us. Peanut and I both whipped around and watched it go, and next thing I knew, this giant white cat was perched on top of the Fuzzy Friends van. Look what I found! Give yourself some credit in the comments!

the case of the missing cat!!! When I got to Fuzzy Friends, everything seemed totally normal. Brandon's grandma waved to me from the front desk, where she was helping a happy family with adoption paperwork.

Big booms sounded, rain smacked the window, and flashes of light illuminated my bedroom. The cat wisely took up a position under the bed, but I had a restless night. However, when I awoke the next morning, all I heard was chirping birds and water gurgling through gutters. I wondered how my friend Joan had survived the night, so I knocked on her apartment door. We had lightning and thunder, plus torrential rain! Our drought-stricken California earth was bombarded. Probably Thunder went into hiding. My kitty Ulu was terrified! Where can he be? Can you help me search? First, I scrutinized the living room where I observed a plate of untouched food congealed into a lump no cat would deign to touch. I bombarded Joan with questions of the usual detective sort when, what, where and how and stated my conclusions: Next we called Animal Control since Thunder had a chip. Same story, no cat. I made her a cup of soothing Chamomile tea and suggested she sit down. Since the usual detective methods had only told me so much, it was time to take the next step. At first she poo-pooed this new age approach, but finally she consented. Suddenly she jumped up with a shout: I took Thunder to the vet late yesterday to get his shots. Since the vet said a big storm was coming, I knew how scared Thunder would be and left him there overnight. Thanks for your sleuthing, Sherlock! We can cuddle under a heap of blankets and endure it together, Joan and Thunder united against the elements.
