If you know where to look, there are several places where the Fleet can be seen flowing blatantly above ground. Further along its route it can be seen and heard by anyone willing to crouch over a back street drain cover. Visit this unusual selection of spots to witness the diminished, but yet powerful, presence of a mighty buried river. Vale of Health, Hampstead The source. The trail begins on the west side of Hampstead Heath, the top of the ridge. Vale of Health is now a pleasant, strangely isolated corner of Hampstead, but its cheerful name is a rebranding exercise. Here, hidden among thick trees and undergrowth, is the only place where the Fleet still flows above ground. The Hampstead Stream flows gently across the heath, at first hidden away but more and more visible as it becomes the string of ponds for which the Heath is well known. The Viaduct Pond, above, with its fine bridge, is connected via a small tributary. Then there are three more ponds – the Mixed Bathing Pond, No1 Pond and No2 Pond – originally reservoirs formed by damming the Hampstead Brook, which supplied London with drinking water. The river can be seen draining away through a grille at the south end of No2 Pond. Kenwood House Photo used under Creative Commons. The Concert Pond, pictured, features a two-dimensional bridge inserted as a back-drop. The setting is made possible by the Highgate Brook, the eastern headwaters of the Fleet, which can be seen bubbling from the ground in a grove of trees at the south-west corner of the house. The stream quickly gathers pace to feed the Lily Pond and then the Concert Pond, but the spring seems to go unnoticed. Highgate Ponds Photo used under Creative Commons. The Highgate Brook, like its Hampstead counterpart, was dammed to create an even longer string of reservoirs, now also ponds. Two of these, along with Mixed Bathing Pond on the Hampstead side, offer a chance to swim in the waters of the Fleet itself, before it gets mixed up with the sewage system. Grab the chance before long-running plans to close the Highgate Ponds and rebuild the dams are put into action. Churchill Road footbridge Photo: After its flamboyant displays on Hampstead Heath, the Fleet vanishes into the storm sewer tunnels that carry it on the rest of its journey to the Thames. However, this does not mean it is completely out of sight. The next clear indication of a river is not far from Tufnell Park tube station. Crossing alongside is a fat, flaking pipe which contains the Highgate Brook. It is unlabelled and apparently unloved, but without it the river would go no further. At the bottom of Lyme Street in the Camden hinterlands, a heavy iron grating sits in the the road outside the Prince Albert pub. Because it is in a bike lane getting down close is a little risky, but it is worth it. The Fleet can be smelled in the form of a drainy odour, heard rushing past, and seen as a surprisingly strong flow of water glinting away in the gloom. Between Camden and Farringdon, the Fleet hides away again. However, the river is not visible again until it has passed under the Rosebery Avenue bridge to reach Ray Street. Outside the Coach and Horses pub another solid grating conceals the Fleet sewer, the water clearly audible and visible as eyes become accustomed to the dark. This was once the centre of Hockley-in-the-Hole, a damp and diseased neighbourhood of ramshackle housing built around and over the Fleet. It was popular as a dubious resort, with gambling, bear baiting and other inventive forms of animal torture. The Coach and Horses, which recently closed, is on the site of the original Hockley tavern, where in one of the bears killed the landlord. This is one pub London cannot afford to lose. Through the back streets of Farringdon, Saffron Hill weaves downhill to meet the buried Fleet at the junction with Greville Road. A classic Fleet drain cover offers a clear sighting of the river rushing beneath, its gentle roar masked by the traffic. The rookery was demolished and Farringdon Road built in the s, with the Fleet dispatched below ground. Although the Fleet cannot strictly be seen or heard from Holborn Viaduct, it is tantalisingly close. This stretch of the Fleet was known as the Holebourne, and Holborn Viaduct is quite clearly a bridge across a wide deep valley carved out by its flow. Standing on Holborn Viaduct and looking south, towards Blackfriars and the Thames, there is a powerful feeling of being suspended above a river. The water has been replaced by a flow of cars and buses, while the river is carried in cavernous twin tunnels under Farringdon Street. Leon at

Ludgate Circus Photo: There is no Fleet to be seen at the Ludgate Circus branch of Leon, but there is a mystery to solve. Ludgate Circus is located beside an ancient Fleet crossing, where Fleet Street bridged the river, but the King Lud pub that used to guard it has gone. Former regulars claim that the pub boasted a stretch of the Fleet itself, which could be seen flowing under a glass floor panel, possibly in the basement. There is no trace of this now, and staff claim there is nothing the basement holds no secrets. So is this just a rumour, or did the Fleet once flow in the King Lud? Once a broad, tidal inlet occupied by ships, the mouth of the Fleet has declined over several centuries and is now just a dark hole in the Embankment. Hidden away in the shadows under Blackfriars Bridge, at the spot where papal banker Roberto Calvi was found hanging in , the outfall is hard to see. The best view is from Blackfriars Pier because, although the foreshore may be technically accessible at low tide, it is not advised. The hole may look small for what was once a substantial river, but it handles a lot of water. In heavy rain the sewers overflow into the storm system, which carries the Fleet, and the power of the water flips open 2. The Super Sewer project will end this, changing the Embankment here for good. Construction work has already begun on a new pier, so take your chance while you can to pay tribute to the still-mighty Fleet. Last Updated 15 December

When he bought the building, the site had 3, railroad ties on it. We played industrial croquet down there with sledgehammers. We had the wickets set up over a four- or five-block area. Their cultures, like the river, are in continual flux, yet also exemplify slow, geologic change: Mallinckrodt occupies the same spot as it did in A waitress there says most business comes from Bremen Bank next door. He wanted to plant gardens and teach people how to live self-sufficiently, so he flew his smiley-face flag there for a little more than a year before moving on. Then there was Mickey Goldstein of Golden Railroad Supply, who was on the river until he recently retired, rotating train wheels and filing them round again. Among them is Carl Roberts, who angles for trophy catfish and serves as a guide on the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. He went to the banks of the Mississippi with a fishing pole, hung out with the guys there, and pun intended got hooked. Three years later, he bought a boat to access the entire river. One of his favorite spots is below the Melvin Price Locks and Dam. The fish congregate there for shelter. She rattles off a handful of types: They visit the north riverfront once a year to build sculptures, play music, dance, or project films onto the buildings and flood walls. One time, as the pair were walking their dogs to the riverfront, they noticed football tailgaters leaving trash and unchecked fires. In , during a Memorial Day potluck, the couple gave their guests disposable cameras and told them to take pictures and think of art projects for the north riverfront area. In , they organized the first Artica, which included a Parade of Dreams, in which people built tiny biodegradable boats and released them into the Mississippi River, and a performance-art piece from The Untitled Group. There are also cool sites on the south riverfront, says Turnage, including Sugar Loaf Mound and the bluffs. But the group has its own magic. Their goal was to float down the Mississippi River on a raft, and stop off at different towns and tell stories of the history of people on the river. After everything was over Dressed all in white, except for the patterning on his head kerchief and an embroidered cross on his hat right about where the priest would mark your forehead on Ash Wednesday , he looks a little bit like an astronautâ€™but his thoughts are with heaven, not outer space. He kindly accommodates both. He is keeping a journal of his experiences, and says he will continue to visit the spot every Sunday between 10 a. It was so isolated, but so close to the city. You would see deer tracks, and red foxes hopping through the weeds. There were nine Indian mounds in the vicinity, basically between Biddle and Florida streets along the river. It was a sacred place. There were burial mounds there.
