Young Thomas finds life to be most unfair and he often takes his frustration out on his little sister Margaret when things get the best of him. Still, Thomas cherishes Margaret as everyone does. Margaret has learned her role well. At first it seems she has an unfailing Pollyanna attitude about he The impact childhood has on our lives can never be underestimated. At first it seems she has an unfailing Pollyanna attitude about her meager life. She seems to make the best of everything and is always hopeful. Their mother is gone. Their father works long hours butchering livestock for a living. It starts the day Thomas leaves Margaret alone in the tent and walks to town to buy a pocket knife. The tent is gone one night when their father gets home from work. Life is not kind to him either and he ends up in jail and the children are moved from one home to another. There is one well off family that desperately wants them it seems. Their son, Jesse-boy is so taken with little Margaret and his mother tries to make up for his illness by catering to his every whim. One night the time is right and they steal eight dollars from Mrs. A sad story of neglect, strength and love that triumphs in the end, for some of them that is First, the children represented acted their age. The older boy 12 does some nasty things to his sister both verbal and physical but you expect a kid that age to act out. You expect the sister to want pretty things to wear and eat. All the characters showed their warts. The rich couple both had issues of their own and had an agenda of their own but in the meanwhile the kids had a roof over their head and food to eat. This takes place during the Depression so you have all that going on with the personal narratives. Thumbs down for the cover--Margaret was described as beautiful, with long blonde ringlets and I think the girl on the front looks like Scout from To Kill a Mockingbird. I really hated this book. Why I finished it is beyond me. What a total downer. The last chapter was redemptive. Only you had to wade through hundreds of pages of total downer to get the 15 pages of everything turns out fine. This book features a runaway mother who ultimately turns her children over to an orphanage, then tries to adopt out the daughter to the wealthy couple who were horrible. Then the son tries some creepy behavior toward the 8 year old. Need I go on? Has the whole world gone crazy for these children? I forgot to mention that the wealthy family had their father put into jail.

She lives in Andover, Massachusetts. Why do you think she decided to give up all her plans and get married? Do you think this was the right choice for her? Are women still faced with these same kinds of choices and consequences today? What does she think will happen? What is Irene so afraid of? What do you think Thomas means by this? In life, however, many people do in fact continue destructive patterns within a family. Why do you think Margaret is able to overcome her past? And if it does, how do we keep ourselves from making the same mistakes as our parents? Gladys is one of the most benevolent characters in the book. Why do you think Gladys is able to be so forgiving? We are told by Mrs. Could Henry have done anything differently so that things might not have turned out as dire for his family? Irene has been successful at hiding Margaret and Thomas from Mr. Dexter until the day Mr. Dexter inadvertently discovers them at the house. At that point p. Why do you think she claims them at that particular moment? How has the way we parent today changed at all since time of the Depression? Do you think we are more or less enlightened?
